scope of his employment, although it may or may not have been ratified by the carrier.[53]

However, under the rule in some jurisdictions it is held that the carrier is not liable in exemplary damages for the willful or malicious acts of its employees in ejecting a passenger from its train or car unless it participated in,[54] previously authorized, or subsequently ratified[55] such acts, or has been guilty of misconduct in the employment of, or the retention in its employment of, the employee.[56]

On the other hand, whether the ejection is rightful or wrongful, if it is accomplished without malice or unnecessary force, or indignity, and with reasonable care, exemplary damages may be refused,[57] as where the passenger is ejected through a mistake on the part of the conductor without any willful or intentional violation of the passenger's rights.[58] Where a passenger's ejection is due to the fault of an agent or prior conductor in not furnishing the passenger with proper evidence of his right to ride, it has been held that exemplary or punitive damages cannot be recovered, in the absence of malice, wantonness, or willful wrong on the part of the conductor performing the ejection.[59] However, if the agent or first conductor is found to be grossly negligent or willful in making the mistake which resulted in the passenger's ejection, exemplary damages have been allowed on the theory that the ejection is the proximate result of such employee's act.[60] Even though a person is rightfully ejected, exemplary damages may be allowed where the carrier's employees use unnecessary force or violence in accomplishing the ejection.[61]

Compelling a passenger to pay money under threat of a wrongful ejection has been held sufficient to entitle the passenger to exemplary damages,[62] although there is authority to the con-

Ejection from moving train

Ejecting a passenger from a moving railway car with such force and in such a way as to cause him to fall to the ground and injure himself discloses conduct so malicious and reckless as to justify punitive damages even though the person ejected was merely a trespasser, because no more force than necessary to accomplish removal may be used—Southern Pac. Co. v. Boyce, 223 P. 116, 26 Ariz 162.

Honest mistake of conductor

Admitting that a conductor was honestly mistaken in his belief that a passenger's ticket entitled him to passage only to a certain station, such belief would not relieve his actions, in ejecting the passenger, from charge of being wanton, malicious, and reckless so as to render carrier liable for punitive damages, in view of evidence that the conductor wrongfully charged passenger with failure to purchase a ticket to his destination and then grabbed hold of him and shoved him toward the door, just previous to and at the time he was compelled to step or jump from the moving train.—Southern Pac Co. v. trary.[63]

Exemplary damages are not allowed as a matter of right,[64] but to justify their allowance the facts of vindictiveness and malice must expressly appear.[65] The mere fact that a person is unlawfully ejected does not entitle him to recover such damages.[66]

The presence of malice need not be evidenced by the manner in which the act is done; it may be inferred from the nature of the wrong done in view of the surrounding circumstances, as where a passenger is unlawfully ejected from a train at a time and place which greatly and unnecessarily aggravates the wrong.[67]

It has been held that exemplary damages cannot be recovered against a carrier, unless they could have been recovered against the employee making the wrongful ejection.[68]

Exemplary damages are allowed by way of punishment regardless of the amount of damages actually sustained.[69]

§ 854. - Inadequate or Excessive Damages

An award of damages will not ordinarily be disturbed in the absence of circumstances showing that is the result of passion, prejudice, or mistake.

As a general rule, the amount of damages to which a passenger is entitled for a wrongful ejection from a train or car is within the discretion of the jury or the court trying the cause, so far as the nonpecuniary elements are concerned,[70] and the decision of the jury is generally conclusive where the amount allowed is not so inadequate,[71] or is not so excessive,[72] as to induce the belief that the

K. PASSENGER'S BAGGAGE OR EFFECTS

1. In General

§ 855. What Constitutes Baggage

Baggage includes in general such articles as a passenger takes with him for his personal use, comfort, and convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, with reference either to his immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of his journey.

The terms "baggage" and "luggage," which have been regarded as synonymous or equivalent in meaning and as signifying one and the same thing,[75] are generally so defined as to include whatever articles a passenger usually takes with him for his own personal use, comfort, and convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to his immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of his journey.[76] It is not confined to wearing ap-condition, because of exposure after ejection—Southern Pac. Co. v. Ulmer, Tex Civ App., 282 S W. 305, affirmed, Com App., 286 S.W. 193.

parel, and the carrier cannot restrict the right of a passenger to carry baggage necessary for his comfort or convenience by calling it wearing apparel.[77]

It is not practicable to say with precise accuracy just what the term "baggage" may or may not include.[78] As to the general definition of the term the authorities differ but little, although the results reached in the application of the definition to the facts of particular cases are often varied,[79] and depend in some measure at least on the particular circumstances.[80] Whether or not certain articles are within the term "baggage," so as to render a carrier liable for their loss, is to be determined from the character and length of the journey the owner is on, its purposes and objects, his station in life, and the habits and usages of the class of travelers to which he belongs.[81]

What constitutes "baggage" within the rules as to innkeepers' liability for loss or injury see C.J.S. title Innkeepers § 16, also 32 C.J. p. 550 notes 26–35.

Articles for use during journey and afterward. A traveler is in general entitled to carry with him as baggage such articles, having regard to the considerations set forth above, as are fairly and ordinarily necessary to his personal comfort and convenience, both during the journey and for a reasonable period thereafter; and regard must be had to the nature of the journey on which a passenger is bound; its immediate necessities as well as its ultimate purposes are to be considered.[82] Baggage, however, has been held not to include articles to be used after the consummation of the journey,[83] or which are not carried to supply any wants of the traveler, as such, on his journey.[84]

Personal to passenger

An essential element is that the property shall be personal to the passenger, and carried for his use and convenience.—Wall-A-Hee v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 41 P.2d 786, 180 Wash. 656.

Usage of passengers

In determining what is baggage "what such passenger has been in the habit of carrying in his travels for his personal convenience, or use, within a reasonable limit, and what a person so circumstanced is ordinarily in the habit of carrying" may be considered.—Cleveland-Akron Bus Co. v. Royoff, 159 N.E. 374, 375, 25 Ohio App. 538.

Receptacles and contents

"Ordinary baggage is made up of two elements. First, certain things which may become such; second, the bags, trunks, valises, satchels, packages or other receptacles in which these things are to be put before they can be deemed baggage. In other words, the bag or other receptacle and their contents are both necessary components of the legal idea conveyed by the term baggage."—State v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 71 Mo.App. 385, 390.

Distinguished from other "property"

Baggage is property carried by the person, and stands on a different footing from the carriage of other property, so that a statute authorizing street surface railroads to carry persons and property in their cars cannot be presumed to limit the term "property" to baggage merely.—De Grauw v. Long Island Electric R. Co., 60 N.Y.S. 163, 43 App.Div. 502, affirmed 57 N.E. 1108, 163 N.Y. 597.

ferred as to what articles shall be transported as baggage between points within the state.[85]

An interstate carrier which carries on its operations under the authority of the interstate commerce commission is governed by the rules of the commission touching the subject of baggage and is permitted to carry as baggage only such goods as are designated as baggage in the applicable rules of the commission.[86] While, according to some cases, such a carrier may not, by its rules and regulations filed with the interstate commerce commission, limit the meaning of the term "baggage" so as to exclude articles which are included in the generally accepted meaning of the term,[87] the contrary view has been taken.[88] In any event a carrier may not effect such limitation by the use of doubtful language in a regulation so filed.[89]

Special contract. A special contract by virtue of which a carrier, to suit its own convenience, takes possession of a passenger's property may, it seems, cover articles which might not ordinarily be regarded as baggage, as affecting the liability of the carrier as such,[90] and in any event, if the carrier takes possession of the property of a passenger for hire, as a special bailee, for its own convenience, the liability of the carrier as bailee is broader than the liability of a common carrier in that it will include articles that would not be regarded as ordinary baggage.[91]

§ 856. Wearing Apparel

Wearing apparel for the reasonable use of the passenger, which is suitable to his circumstances and condition in life, may usually be transported as baggage.

A passenger is entitled to carry as baggage wearing apparel for his reasonable use, no matter how valuable, if suitable to his circumstances and condition in life.[92] This includes such wearing apparel as it would be necessary or reasonable for him to use after arriving at his destination;[93] and it has also been held to include cloth, to a reasonable amount, procured for the purpose of being made into wearing apparel.[94]

§ 857. Presents or Property of Others

Articles intended as presents or which belong to another than the passenger are not usually regarded as baggage.

Articles intended as presents,[95] or carried for the convenience of others,[96] do not come within the meaning of the term "baggage," and in such cases the carrier is liable only as gratuitous bailee; and it has been stated broadly that, if a passenger procures the carriage of property of another as baggage, without knowledge on the part of the carrier as to the true ownership, the carrier is a gratuitous bailee and is liable to the owner only for loss or damage caused by gross negligence or willful misconduct.[97] The fact that a passenger pays extra charges on a trunk and informs the carrier's agent of its contents but does not inform him that certain articles in it belong to another person, and that the carrier accepts the trunk under such a statement, does not constitute an implied contract that the carrier will carry such articles as freight or baggage so as to render it liable for their loss.[98] The mere presence of the name of the owner on a trunk containing such owner's property, taken by another as

Money of another

Baggage for which a carrier is liable does not include money of one passenger contained in a valise which another passenger, with the knowledge of the first, delivers as his own luggage; and to such a passenger a carrier is not liable at all, because he has not been shown to have made any contract with it to transport the baggage.—Dunlap v. his personal baggage, is not notice to the carrier that the contents of the trunk are not the property of the passenger, so as to charge the carrier as a carrier of baggage.[99]

Property of member of family or of relative. Members of the same family traveling together may carry their effects in the same trunk, or one may carry in his trunk the effects of the others, and each may recover for any loss to his baggage.[1] According to some cases, a passenger may carry as baggage articles of a reasonable amount or value which belong to members of his family who are not traveling with him,[2] or which he has purchased for such members,[3] but there is authority to the contrary.[4] It has been held that, where a passenger, without disclosing to the carrier the true ownership thereof, carries as his own baggage the personal effects of a relative not a member of the immediate family of the passenger, and not accompanying the passenger, the carrier is responsible therefor only in the capacity of gratuitous bailee, and the owner cannot recover for loss or injury without proof of the carrier's gross negligence or willful misconduct.[5]

§ 858. Jewelry and Similar Articles

Jewelry and like articles, suitable to the conditions and circumstances in life of the passenger and intended for personal use during the journey, may, in general, be regarded as baggage, in the absence of any valid statutory or other regulation to the contrary.

Jewelry, opera glasses, and like articles of personal adornment or convenience, suitable to the condition and circumstances in life of the passenger, and intended for personal use during the continuance of the journey, may properly be included as baggage;[6] but not where they are being carried by a traveler for the use of someone else, as shown above supra § 857, or for the purpose of business or sale.[7] Jewelry may be transported as baggage only under a special contract where a valid statute or a valid rule of a public body or commission so provides.[8]

A passenger's watch, when not carried on his person but in his trunk, may properly be taken as a part of his baggage, and he may recover for its loss as such.[9] It has been held, however, that a watch carried by a passenger on his person is not baggage.[10]

While, according to some cases, a carrier engaged in interstate commerce may not, by its rules and regulations filed with the interstate commerce commission, limit the meaning of the term "baggage" so as to exclude jewelry,[11] the contrary view has apparently been taken.[12] In any event the carrier may not effect such limitation by the use of doubtful language in a regulation so filed.[13]

Furthermore, the view has been taken that a provision in a regulation filed, published, and put in force by a carrier, that jewelry should not be inclosed in baggage to be checked is not the equivalent of a provision that jewelry is not baggage or that it will not be transported as baggage.[14]

§ 859. Money

Such reasonable amount of money as is required to meet the actual and contingent expenses of a passenger during his journey may in general be regarded as baggage.

A traveler has the right to carry as part of his baggage such reasonable amount of money as will be required to meet his actual and contingent expenses during the entire journey.[15] In determining the amount properly required for such expenses, the passenger's entire trip is to be considered, and a proper allowance for sojourning on the way, together with a reasonable allowance for accidents, sickness, etc., such as a reasonably prudent man would consider it necessary to make, is to be included.[16] Money may be regarded as baggage only where it is taken bona fide for traveling expenses and personal use on the trip, and the amount is limited to what a reasonably prudent man would consider necessary for the purpose.[17] Money carried merely for transportation, or for business purposes, such as to make purchases, or for remittance, is not baggage, and in the absence of gross negligence the carrier will not be liable for the loss thereof,[18] unless it accepts it as baggage with full knowledge of the facts.[19] A county treasurer carrying with him funds belonging to his office cannot insist that such funds shall be carried as his baggage.[20]

Money in trunk, valise, or box. As a general rule money reasonably necessary and intended for traveling expenses is regarded as baggage, although carried in a trunk or valise.[21] This rule does not, however, include money carried by a passenger in his trunk with which he expects to buy merchandise,[22] or which is so carried merely for the purpose of transportation.[23]

§ 860. Particular Articles

General rules as to what is baggage apply in determining whether or not particular articles, such as books, papers, weapons, tools, or household goods are baggage.

In applying or considering the general rules stated above in §§ 855–857, in connection with the surrounding circumstances, it has been held or recognized that, among other articles,[24] the following may be regarded as baggage: A few books for reading,[25] the manuscript and books of a student, author, or professional man,[26] the papers and books of an attorney at law,[27] photographs of the passenger and of others,[28] photographs of articles, which are to be shown to prospective buyers,[29] the catalogues or manuscript price books of a traveling salesman,[30] weapons, such as one is in the habit of carrying or taking with him for purposes of defense or adornment,[31] the guns and hunting apparatus of a hunter on a hunting expedition,[32] the fishing tackle of a fisherman on a fishing expedition,[33] and the cooking utensils of a camping party.[34]

On the other hand, among other articles,[35] which it has been held or recognized are not included in the term "baggage," are: A bicycle,[36] pictures or engravings,[37] photographs of articles, which are to be shown to prospective buyers,[38] or articles necessary only for the business in which the passenger intends to engage.[39]

Household goods. Furniture, bedding, and other household goods not intended for use during the journey are generally not regarded as baggage,[40] unless accepted as such by the carrier.[41] For such articles the carrier is liable, if at all, only as bailee; it is not liable as insurer, and cannot be compelled to carry them unless proper compensation is tendered.[42] According to some cases, however, such goods may be regarded as baggage so far as they are necessary for the personal use and convenience of a passenger and his family on their journey,[43] and a passenger may also carry whatever of such goods will be reasonably necessary for immediate use on arriving at his destination.[44]

Theatrical property. Costumes and paraphernalia of a traveling theatrical company are generally not regarded as baggage,[45] unless there is a general custom so to regard it.[46] It has been held, however, that manuscript music of an opera company is properly baggage when carried in a trunk checked by the company.[47]

Tools of trade. The tools or utensils used by a passenger in his trade or profession, and which he usually carries with him in his trunk, have been held to be baggage,[48] such as the tools of a traveling jeweler,[49] of a mechanic,[50] or of a carpenter,[51] or the instruments of a dentist or surgeon.[52]

§ 861. Merchandise Other than Personal Effects

a. In general
b. Salesman's samples
c. Acceptance with knowledge of character

a. In General

In general articles of merchandise which are not intended for the personal use of the passenger are not baggage.

At common law a carrier is responsible as an insurer only for the personal baggage of a passenger, and not for merchandise or other articles which properly constitute freight.[53] Articles of merchandise which are not for the personal use of the traveler on his journey, but which are carried for the purpose of sale or trade, are not ordinarily included in the term "baggage;"[54] the carrier is not obliged to carry them, except on the payment of additional compensation, and in the absence of knowledge thereof cannot be held liable for them as for baggage,[55] even though taken in a trunk, such as is usually used for holding personal effects, or mingled with other articles which are properly baggage.[56] The liability of the carrier in such a case is that of a gratuitous bailee, and, in order to recover for loss of, or injury to, the property carried, gross negligence or willful injury must be shown.[57] A carrier may, however, contract to carry as the baggage of a passenger merchandise which is not ordinarily regarded as baggage, and if it does so, it is liable as a common carrier.[58]

b. Salesman's Samples

Goods carried in a trunk as samples by a salesman are not usually regarded as baggage.

Goods carried by a passenger in his trunk as samples, with a view to enabling him to make sales of goods similar to the samples carried, are more properly mere merchandise, and are not to be included within the term "baggage;"[59] the fact that they are necessary to the object of the passenger's journey does not affect the rule.[60] Furthermore, according to some cases, the carrier's liability is not affected by proof that it was in the habit of carrying trunks known to contain samples used by traveling salesmen, where it does not appear that it was aware of the character of the trunk's contents in the particular case in which suit is

Rule in federal courts

Taxicab

The driver of a taxicab which is licensed to carry passengers and their baggage but not to carry merchandise may refuse to carry merchandise.—Barr & Shoulberg v. Yellow Taxi Corporation, 265 N.Y.S. 754, 148 Misc. 855, affirmed 273 N.Y.S. 754, 152 Misc. 293.

"Sample baggage"

(1) "Sample baggage," within the meaning of a provision of an interstate tariff schedule that such baggage is restricted to samples of goods, wares, or merchandise to be transported for use by a passenger in making sales or other disposition of the goods, wares, or merchandise represented, does not include merchandise which is not representative of other merchandise to be sold but which is in fact stock in trade which is to be offered for sale.—Araje v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 167 N.E. 497, 251 N.Y. 354, affirming 231 N.Y.S. 245, 225 App.Div. 73, reversing 223 N.Y.S. 542, 130 Misc. 29

(2) Apparently a like conclusion has been reached in a case in which the various tariff provisions were not set out in the opinion.—Klein v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 218 P. 447, 63 Cal.App. 185.

brought,[61] at least in the absence of any proof of a custom to transport the trunks as baggage without being informed of the character of their contents.[62] Where, however, by general custom a carrier transports trunks containing samples as the personal baggage of salesmen, it is liable as a common carrier, in the same manner and to the same extent as for personal baggage,[63] and, in accordance with the general rule stated below in subdivision c of this section, where the carrier accepts such samples as baggage with knowledge that they are offered for transportation as baggage, it thereby waives any objection on that ground, and its liability therefor is the same as that with reference to baggage in general.[64] It has been held, however, that, where the carrier charges and receives extra compensation for the transportation of such articles, it is liable for their loss, not on its contract for the transportation of the passenger and his personal baggage, but on its contract to carry the same as freight.[65]

A state railroad commission, when duly authorized by statute, may make a valid regulation that "baggage" shall include salesmen's samples for transportation between points within the state.[66]

c. Acceptance with Knowledge of Character

Where a carrier accepts as baggage articles or items of merchandise not usually regarded as baggage, with knowledge of their character and of the fact that they are offered for transportation as baggage, its liability as to such articles or items is the same as its liability as to baggage in general.

In general, where a carrier accepts as baggage articles or items of merchandise which are not properly baggage, with knowledge of their character and of the fact that they are offered for transportation as baggage, it thereby waives any objection on that ground, and its liability therefor is the same as that with reference to baggage in general,[67] as, for example, where the carrier accepts a trunk containing a salesman's samples, considered above in subdivision b of this section. If the carrier has any reasonable grounds for refusing to carry particular property of a passenger tendered as baggage, it must insist on them at the time such property is offered if it desires to avoid liability therefor; it cannot, after it has accepted the property and undertaken to carry it, insist that it might have refused to carry it, and is therefore not liable.[68] The mere fact, however, that passengers have been permitted to take with them packages of merchandise over a carrier's railroad, without objection, does not prove an agreement that any particular package is to be regarded as baggage or that it is transported at the risk of the carrier.[69]

Authority of agents. The general rule is, where there is any question as to the real character of the property offered as baggage, that the regular agent of the carrier, the baggage-master, has implied authority to accept or reject such property as baggage, and his determination is binding on the carrier,[70] unless the passenger has notice of a limitation on the baggage-master's authority in this respect.[71] It has been held that the carrier is bound by the act of its baggage-master in

Acceptance by agent with knowledge of nature of articles

Aside from schedules of rates provided for in Gen.L. 5231, a carrier was bound by the act of an agent in knowingly accepting trunks containing merchandise for transportation as baggage and placing them in the waiting room for the night with the expressed intent of checking them in the morning, such goods being burned during the night.—Simpson v. Central Vermont Ry. Co., 115 A. 299, 95 Vt. 388.

71. Iowa.—Bergstrom v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 111 N.W. 818, 134 Iowa checking as personal baggage goods which are ordinarily not regarded as personal baggage, with knowledge of the facts, where the passenger is ignorant of any limitation on the baggage-master's authority in this regard.[72] There is authority for the view, however, that the fact that a baggage-master checks merchandise as personal baggage, with knowledge of the facts, does not show that the carrier agrees to transport the merchandise or to become liable therefor as a common carrier where there is no showing that the baggage-master has authority to receive freight on a passenger train or to bind the carrier to carry merchandise on a passenger train.[73]

Sufficiency of knowledge or notice. In order to charge a carrier with liability for merchandise carried as baggage, the general rule is that there must be actual knowledge on the part of the carrier or its agents of the true character of the goods offered as baggage.[74] The carrier is not bound to inquire as to the nature of the property, but is entitled to assume that it consists of only such things as are properly baggage.[75] According to some cases, however, it is not necessary that the carrier be expressly notified that the articles are merchandise, or other than personal baggage, and it is sufficient if the agent has notice or knowledge sufficient to put him on inquiry.[76] While, according to some cases, the carrier is liable where the outward appearance of the box or trunk is such as to indicate the character of its contents,[77] the mere appearance of the trunk or other receptacle offered to be checked as one ordinarily in use for carrying merchandise or samples usually will not in itself charge the carrier with knowledge that it does contain merchandise or other than personal baggage.[78]

The fact that other agents of the carrier at other times and places have received and checked merchandise as baggage with knowledge of its true character will not operate as notice to the carrier of its character with respect to a trip in connection with which a claim is made,[79] and knowledge of the agent who checks the alleged baggage is not knowledge of the carrier where the agent acquires such knowledge while engaged in the transaction of his personal affairs.[80] The fact, however, that the carrier's agent is also the agent of another does not prevent attributing to the carrier the agent's knowledge of the nature of the articles involved, where in the transaction in which the agent's knowledge is acquired he acts for both his principals, and there is authority for the view that, where it clearly appears that information obtained by the carrier's agent outside his employment is actually in his mind when he acts for the carrier, such information will be imputed to, and will bind, the carrier, unless such information is obtained under circumstances that will make it the legal duty of the agent not to communicate it to the carrier.[81]

The mere payment of overweight charges on baggage does not of itself constitute notice that the trunk or other receptacle contains merchandise or articles other than ordinary baggage.[82]

Agent for express company and for railroad company

Where station agent went to plaintiff's tent at fairgrounds with an express package as agent of an express company, but at the very time he delivered the package made suggestions about getting trunks to the station, at which time he acquired knowledge that the trunks would contain merchandise, which he afterward accepted as baggage, the view was taken that the agent acquired such knowledge while acting within the scope of his employment as defendant railroad company's agent.—Simpson v. Central Vermont Ry. Co., 115 A. 299, 95 Vt. 388.

10 C.J. p 1196 note 69.

Connecting carrier. Knowledge of the initial carrier is not sufficient to bind a connecting carrier, unless the agents of the former have authority to check merchandise so as to bind the latter.[83] It has been held that, where a passenger buys a through ticket over connecting roads from the agent of the initial carrier, and informs the initial carrier's baggage agent that one of the passenger's trunks contains merchandise, and the trunk is accepted as baggage with such notice, the passenger is entitled to recover for the loss thereof from the connecting carrier, even though it is not personal baggage.[84]

§ 862. Duty of Carrier to Receive and Transport Baggage

In general a common carrier has the duty to transport personal baggage of passengers as an incident to the contract of carriage, subject to reasonable and valid limitations as to weight and value.

A common carrier has the duty to receive and transport personal baggage of passengers,[85] and the contract or duty to carry baggage is an incident to the contract to carry the passenger,[86] the transportation of a reasonable amount of baggage as an incident to the passenger's contract for transportation is a part of the contract to the same extent as is the transportation of the person.[87] Although it was at one time considered that a carrier of passengers could not be made liable as a common carrier for the baggage of its passengers unless a distinct price was paid for its carriage,[88] the rule is now well settled that it is impliedly a part of the contract between the carrier and the passenger that the former will carry for the latter his personal baggage, under reasonable limitations as to weight and value, without additional charge, as the price paid for the ticket or for transportation embraces compensation for the carriage of the baggage, and no special consideration may be demanded by the carrier or need be paid;[89] and in some jurisdictions this duty is prescribed and regulated by statute.[90] This is a public duty, it is not granted as a favor, but may be demanded as a right,[91] except that, as this duty grows out of the contract of transportation, it does not in general arise until the person tendering the baggage has procured the right of transportation as a passenger.[92] The acceptance of free baggage or the checking of baggage as such implies that there is a passenger who intends to pursue the baggage on the train and claim it at destination.[93]

It is the duty of the carrier to receive and transport extra baggage for which an additional charge is paid.[94]

A passenger has the right to retain in his possession and under his control, and to have carried as a part of the transaction, a reasonable amount of personal baggage appropriate to the journey.[95]

Groceries

A ticket entitling one to "personal passage" does not entitle him to carry packages of groceries for the use of his family.—Bullock v. Delaware,

Illegal shipment. A carrier may properly refuse to transport into another state a trunk offered by a passenger as his personal baggage and accepted and checked as such, where the carrier subsequently discovers that the trunk contains intoxicating liquors and the shipment of such liquors into another state would constitute a violation of a federal statute.[96]

Facilities; regulation and discrimination. It is the duty of a carrier to provide a place, and suitable and convenient facilities, for the reception, deposit, and keeping of baggage of prospective and incoming passengers, and such facilities must be furnished without discrimination to all alike who desire to avail themselves thereof.[97]

Rules and regulations prescribing the duties of carriers by bus as to transporting baggage of passengers between points within the state, made by a state commission in accordance with authority duly conferred by statute, are binding on such carriers.[98] In some jurisdictions the authority of a state regulatory body to make rules and regulations affecting the activities of a terminal company which represents or acts for carriers in receiving and handling baggage includes authority to make just and reasonable regulations respecting the receipt, handling, and safe-keeping of baggage and to prevent unjust discrimination in this regard.[99]

In granting a certain amount of free baggage, the carrier may make reasonable rules and regulations with reference thereto provided they do not conflict with the duty of the carrier to the public in relation to baggage.[1] So the right of a passenger to take property with him into cars or other vehicles of conveyance is subject to reasonable regulation, not only as to what may be thus taken,[2] but also as to how far the carrier will be liable for articles retained by the passenger under his control, as shown infra § 869. While the view has been expressed that a rule of a carrier that a person intending to become a passenger shall purchase a ticket or pay fare before the company receives and becomes liable for his baggage is a reasonable regulation,[3] according to some cases, a rule that baggage shall not be received into the baggage room until a ticket shall have been procured is unreasonable.[4]

§ 863. Checking Baggage

The duty of a carrier to carry baggage may involve the duty to check such baggage to any destination on its line or to a point on a connecting line to which it sells a ticket. It is the duty of a carrier to avoid unjust and arbitrary discriminations among passengers in respect of checking baggage.

The general duty of a carrier to carry the baggage of its passengers requires that it shall check such baggage to any destination on its line,[5] or to a point on a connecting line to which it sells a ticket;[6] and it cannot refuse to check to certain stations on its line merely to avoid the transfer of passengers and their baggage to rival lines.[7]

Unmarked trunks

Where the trunk delivered to the carrier was not labeled to show the consignee or that it contained intoxicating liquors, the carrier, on discovering that it contained intoxicating liquors, could refuse to transport it to another state, in view of the fact that a violation of U.S.Cr. Code § 240 would have resulted. A like rule would apply if the place in another state to which the trunk was to be shipped was in dry territory, in view of the federal statute as to shipments of intoxicating liquors into dry territory.—Shannon v. Hines, 226 S.W. 283, 205 Mo.App. 629.

Authority of agent

The act of an agent of a connecting carrier in issuing through baggage checks on the purchase of a ticket on his own line, and the passenger's agreement to purchase a ticket to complete the journey, is within the apparent scope of his authority and binding on both carriers.—St. Louis, etc., R. A common carrier is not obliged, however, to accept any transfer agent's claim or identification check as the basis for the issuance by the carrier of a baggage check to destination, in the absence of any valid and controlling law or regulation so requiring.[8]

Penalty for refusal to check. Valid statutory provisions imposing a penalty on a carrier for refusing to check baggage or to give a check are given effect in accordance with the terms of such provisions duly construed,[9] but it has been held that such a statute is to be strictly construed and that the carrier will not be held liable where the case does not fall within the provisions of the statute as so construed.[10] Whether such a penalty is in the nature of liquidated damages must depend on the intent of the legislature as appearing in the statute.[11]

Rules and regulations; discrimination. A railroad company receiving baggage for interstate transportation is not required to give any other receipt than the customary baggage check, under the Interstate Commerce Act which requires a railroad company which receives property for transportation in interstate commerce to issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor.[12]

It is the duty of a common carrier to check baggage without unjust discriminations that affect passengers,[13] and in some jurisdictions at least a terminal company which represents or acts for carriers in receiving, handling, and checking baggage may not arbitrarily subject one class of passengers to inconvenience in the matter of identification of baggage for the purpose of checking, from which such company saves another class of passengers.[14] Whether or not there is an unjust discrimination in a particular case depends on the facts and on the controlling constitutional and statutory provisions and principles of law, and a determination as to whether a particular practice of a carrier is an unjust discrimination involves a consideration of the rights of the carrier together with other facts and circumstances affecting the matter.[15] An unjust discrimination by a common carrier in checking passengers' baggage may be remedied pursuant to constitutional and statutory provisions, even though the principles of the common law do not forbid such discrimination.[16]

In some jurisdictions the authority of a state regulatory body to make rules and regulations affecting the activities of a terminal company which represents or acts for carriers in receiving, handling, and checking baggage includes authority to make just and reasonable regulations respecting the checking of baggage, and to prevent unjust and arbitrary discrimination in that regard.[17] A regulation which purports to prevent discrimina-

In a case in which there was involved a question as to discrimination in accepting, for the purpose of checking baggage, the claim checks of a transfer agent which brought baggage to a railroad station, the view was expressed that, while special concessions may be made to transfer agents by common carriers in some cases, the privileges so conferred may not be exercised so as to cause unjust discriminations affecting passengers.—State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 106 So. 576, 90 Fla. 721.

Practice not unjust discrimination

Requirement of railroad terminal company that passengers identify, for the purpose of checking, baggage transported to station by passengers' transfer agents who had not assumed obligation to indemnify terminal company was not an unjust discrimination, notwithstanding the terminal company accepted for the purpose of identification the claim check of a transfer company which had given to the terminal company a bond to indemnify the latter, if the terminal company did not unlawfully or unjustly discriminate in taking indemnification from responsible transfer agents.—State v. Regulation of right of terminal company to protect itself

The exercise of the right of a terminal company to protect itself against the delicts of irresponsible transfer companies or persons who deliver to the terminal company the baggage of prospective passengers may reasonably be regulated by due

tion must, however, be reasonable, and a regulation which is manifestly and materially out of proportion to the benefit of mere convenience to accrue to certain passengers by the imposition of added risk on the terminal company is unreasonable and is not binding on such company, as, for example, a regulation by the state regulatory body which requires the terminal company to accept the claim checks of any transfer agent bringing baggage to the station, in lieu of actual identification of the baggage, for the purpose of checking, without regard to the reliability of the transfer agent or of the latter's assuming an obligation to indemnify the terminal company for loss or damage due to the acts or defaults of the transfer agent.[18] It has been held, however, that a state regulatory body, acting pursuant to authority duly conferred by statute, may require a terminal company to accept, for purposes of checking, the claim checks of any transfer agent who furnishes a proper and sufficient bond to indemnify the terminal company against loss or damage.[19] A regulation of this type has been construed as one which creates, and imposes on the terminal carrier, a duty, and not one which purports to deal with, or undertakes to prevent, an unjust discrimination.[20] In some jurisdictions, however, an order of the state regulatory body in respect of the handling and checking of baggage after it has been delivered to a terminal company must be predicated on an unjust discrimination.[21]

A regulation that baggage shall not be checked until a ticket has been procured is a reasonable one,[22] as is also a rule requiring the ticket to be exhibited to the proper agent before such checking is done.[23] A carrier may in general prescribe the conditions on which it will check property as to which special care in handling is required.[24]

§ 864. Charges and Liens on Baggage

A carrier has a lien on the baggage of a passenger for the charge for transportation of the passenger and baggage.

A carrier has a lien on the baggage of a passenger for the entire charge for transportation of the passenger and baggage, and it is immaterial whether the baggage has been checked, if it is still in the possession of the carrier when it seeks to enforce its lien,[25] unless the carrier is estopped to assert the lien.[26] While thus retaining baggage under a lien, the carrier is liable therefor as bailee.[27] It has been held, however, that a carrier has no lien on a passenger's baggage for the fare of a minor child of such passenger, accompanying the passenger, which the passenger refuses to pay.[28]

Inconvenience in identifying baggage

The state railroad commission may, by reasonable regulation, prevent a terminal company from arbitrarily subjecting one class of passengers to inconvenience in the matter of identification of baggage for the purpose of checking, from which such company saves another class of passengers.—State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 117 So. 869, 96 Fla. 295, 59 A.L.R. 324.

19. Ga.—Atlanta Terminal Co. v. Georgia Public Service Commission, 137 S.E. 556, 163 Ga. 897.

Preventing discrimination

Where the terminal company has an agreement by which it accepts, for the purpose of checking baggage, the claim checks issued by a particular transfer agent who has furnished a bond to the terminal company to indemnify the latter from loss or damage for baggage handled by such transfer agent, the state regulatory body, acting pursuant to authority duly conferred by statute, may require the terminal company to accept the claim checks of all transfer agents who furnish a like bond.—State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 117 So. 869, 96 Fla. 295, 59 A.L.R. 324.

Effect of constitutional provision specifically conferring power on general assembly

An order of the public service commission which required a terminal company to receive in its baggage room baggage properly identified by a duplicate claim check of such persons, firms, or corporations which were engaged in the business of hauling baggage as complied with the order which contained a provision for a bond of indemnity, and to issue a train check to the owner presenting such duplicate claim check, did not violate the constitutional provision, art 4, § 2, par 1, Civ.Code § 6463, § 2-2501, which specifically confers on the general assembly power and authority to regulate railroad freights and passenger tariffs.—Atlanta Terminal Co. v. quires that a check be attached to excess baggage on which the charge is paid, and that no such check is attached to the baggage involved, will not defeat a passenger's right to demand his baggage without paying excess, if in fact he has already paid the charge.[29]

If a person employs a carrier to transport the baggage of such person and pays the carrier in advance, another carrier who performs the service of transportation, without the authorization of the owner, is not entitled to a lien for his services, but, in respect of property which the owner is not entitled to carry as baggage, where a shipping merchant, who contracts with the owner to forward such property and who has not received payment in advance for the transportation, employs another to forward such property, the agent of such other is entitled to hold such property until the charges are paid.[30]

A final carrier which retains baggage on a mere blind charge of a previous carrier does so at its peril if the charge is not one connected with the transportation, and a terminal association which was not a carrier of a passenger or his baggage and which receives the baggage from the final carrier after the carriage is completed, in holding the baggage and asserting a lien thereon for a charge of a previous carrier, does so as a mere agent and has no greater right than the principal.[31]

Where the carrier ceases to be such and becomes a warehouseman, it has a lien on baggage left in storage for the storage charges and may detain the baggage until the lien is paid;[32] but a carrier is not entitled to storage charges on baggage which it has failed to deliver when called for.[33]

It has been held that an order of a state regulatory body which gives to traveling salesmen the right to a special exemption from storage charges on baggage after reaching destination which is not enjoyed by other travelers is unfair, unreasonable, and void.[34] Interstate passengers and shippers are charged with notice of the rates of common carriers of checked baggage as disclosed by published tariffs on file with the interstate commerce commission pursuant to acts of congress regulating interstate commerce,[35] and provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, carrier's rules, filed with the interstate commerce commission, and orders of the commission as to rates and valuations are binding on the shipper and carrier of baggage transported in interstate commerce.[36]

Questions as to the right of a carrier to impose a charge for extra baggage or for the carriage of articles not ordinarily regarded as baggage, and as to the regulation and method of fixing extra charges, have been considered in some cases and are discussed in certain aspects infra § 865.

§ 865. Extra Baggage and Special Contracts

In the absence of any valid and controlling law or regulation to the contrary, a carrier may make an extra charge for value of baggage beyond a certain limit, for weight beyond a reasonable limit, or for the carriage of property not ordinarily regarded as baggage

In the absence of any valid and controlling law or regulation to the contrary, a carrier may make an extra charge for value beyond a reasonable limit fixed, and may require information as to the value for the purpose of determining such charge.[37] So subject to any valid statutory or other controlling regulation, a carrier may make an extra charge for weight beyond a reasonable limit,[38] or for accepting merchandise which is not properly

Duty of passenger to make disclosure

Where there is a dispute at the receiving station between the carrier and the passenger as to the payment of an excess baggage rate on account of alleged overweight, it is the duty of the passenger to make a true explanation of his position to the carrier's agents, or at least to baggage,[39] and, on accepting the extra amount charged, becomes liable as common carrier with reference to the merchandise thus accepted, to the same extent as though the goods were carried as freight.[40] Such a transaction as to excess value or weight, or as to merchandise which would not otherwise be properly checked as baggage, extra compensation being charged, may be treated as a separate contract,[41] and, according to some cases, knowledge by the carrier of the contents of the receptacles may be immaterial where no inquiry is made.[42] The mere fact that overweight charges are paid does not, however, convert the baggage into freight.[43]

Regulation and fixing rates; discrimination. State statutes regulating rates or charges for excess baggage[44] or providing for regulation by a public regulatory body[45] are given effect in accordance with their terms duly construed; and the purpose of some, if not all, such statutes is to prevent unfair discriminations.[46] A statute which makes it a misdemeanor for a carrier to charge more than a fixed sum for transporting excess baggage is not violated by a carrier's knowingly accepting merchandise as baggage and transporting it as such, and charging therefor a rate exceeding the maximum amount charged for carrying excess baggage.[47]

Under published tariffs on file with the interstate commerce commission, interstate passengers have a choice of rates for the carriage of baggage of a certain weight, dependent on the valuation placed by the passengers on the baggage, as affecting the extent of the carrier's liability.[48]

In general passengers are charged with notice of, and are bound by, tariffs filed by the carrier with the proper state authority,[49] or filed with the proper state and federal authorities and duly posted,[50] in accordance with the governing provisions of law, and interstate passengers are charged with notice of regulations of, and tariffs published by, the interstate commerce commission making provision for charges apportioned to the risk assumed by the carrier.[51]

Where a carrier's tariff of rates and charges has been filed with the proper public authorities in accordance with the governing provisions of law, and have become operative, the carrier may neither waive nor modify the provisions of such tariff.[52] The carrier must charge and collect, and the passenger must pay, the rates so fixed, without deviation, unless the rate is found to be unreasonable by the public regulatory body clothed with authority in that regard, and, where the rate is based on the value of the articles, it is the duty of the carrier to require the passenger to declare the value.[53] It has been held, in respect of an interstate transaction, however, that a railroad company cannot recover the tariff rate for an extra number of passenger tickets from a person with whom the company had contracted to transport a certain number of passengers and to furnish a special baggage car without charge, where such person had purchased enough tickets to entitle him to obtain a special baggage car without charge under the published tariff and the claim to recover for extra

tickets arises solely out of the error of the agent of the carrier in issuing the tickets and in separating the party for transportation on different trains and dates.[54]

§ 866. Checks and Receipts

The usual baggage check delivered to a passenger does not embody the contract for transportation, but is a receipt furnishing evidence of ownership and a means of identifying the baggage.

The usual baggage check delivered to a passenger on receiving his baggage in no sense embodies the contract of carriage between the passenger and the carrier, but is a receipt merely, intended to afford evidence of ownership and for identifying the baggage,[55] and the mere fact that the passenger does not receive a check or other receipt is immaterial where the carrier actually receives the baggage into its possession.[56]

The delivery of a check is intended to relieve the passenger from any care or superintendence of the baggage while en route, and devolves such care on the carrier's agents.[57]

A claim check is a check or receipt given by a transfer company for baggage to be delivered at a railroad station and held in the baggage room until the check is presented by the passenger; and a claim check system sometimes includes the privilege of checking the baggage of prospective passengers at hotels and residences in advance of delivery at the passenger station.[58]

Questions as to the possession of a check or receipt as prima facie evidence of certain facts or as the basis of a presumption are discussed infra § 897.

2. Liability for Delay, Loss of, or Injury to, Baggage

§ 867. In General

A carrier, on assuming the care and custody of baggage, prima facie at least is liable as a common carrier in respect of such baggage, and its liability is in general that of an insurer.

Where a carrier assumes the care and custody of baggage, prima facie at least it assumes the liability of a common carrier as to such baggage,[59] and in general the liability of a carrier for the personal baggage of a passenger intrusted to its care, unless specially restricted or limited, is the same as its common-law liability as a carrier of goods,[60] and, therefore, its liability in case such baggage is lost, stolen, or injured is in general absolute[61] or, as usually stated, is that of an insurer,[62] unless the loss or injury is caused by an

The fact that only one check was given for a trunk which contained the baggage of several members of a family, all of whom had tickets or passes for transportation, which were presented to the carrier's agent when the trunk was checked, was immaterial in view of the rule that the check does not embody the contract of transportation but is merely a receipt—Payne v. Statutory provision
In Oklahoma, in view of the fact that under statute, Rev.L.1910, § 807, the liability of a carrier of baggage intrusted to its care is the same as that of a common carrier of property, in the event of loss the carrier is liable unless the loss is occasioned by the act of God or unavoidable accident.—St. Louis & S. Exclusive possession
The view has been expressed that on obtaining by common carrier of exclusive possession of a passenger's baggage, it becomes insurer thereof.—Hessler v Detroit & C Nav. Co., 170 N.Y S. 513, 103 Misc. 551.

Negligence
(1) Common carriers' liability is more than liability for negligence; they are insurers of the safety of the article, subject to certain limitations—Barnet v. Pullman Co., 281 N. Y S 575, 155 Misc. 876

(2) Where a carrier, by obtaining exclusive possession of the baggage act of God or the public enemy, considered infra § 868, by the negligence of the owner of the baggage, considered infra § 873, or by the inherent qualities of the baggage;[63] and this rule applies to carriers of passengers by stagecoach.[64]

As a carrier of goods is not liable as common carrier unless the carriage is for compensation, as shown supra § 3, so if the passenger is carried gratuitously,[65] if transportation of baggage is secured on the erroneous assumption that one is a passenger[66] or if the person who offers baggage for checking is not a passenger or does not intend to become a passenger, and conceals that fact,[67] the carrier is liable only as any other carrier of goods without compensation, that is, for such negligence as would charge a gratuitous bailee, although it is not necessary expressly to show payment of fare where the carriage is not understood to be gratuitous.[68] The mere fact that the owner of a trunk intends to obtain the transportation of such trunk by the improper use of the pass of another person which has expired does not relieve a terminal company of its liability as a bailee under a lucrative bailment where the trunk has been lost while in the possession of such company before the owner seeks to obtain possession for delivery to a carrier for transportation.[69]

Services of a red cap porter in carrying a passenger's hand baggage to train constitute part of the consideration for the price paid by the passenger for transportation and are not gratuitous, as affecting the carrier's liability, notwithstanding the carrier may, if it wishes, withhold porter service and the applicable tariff provides that, where red cap porter service is provided, hand baggage will be handled without charge by such porters.[70] So it has been held that a red cap porter who is in the general employment of a railroad company is an employee of such company so as to render the company liable to a passenger for the loss of hand baggage caused by the negligence of such porter while in possession of such baggage in order to take it to the passenger's train, even though the porter is not paid by the company for that type of service, and even though the company has not filed tariffs covering the services of red cap porters.[71]

Where a passenger places intoxicating liquors in a trunk for transportation in interstate commerce in violation of a federal statute, the lawful seizure of such liquors by government officers while in the carrier's possession terminates the liability of the carrier as such in respect of such liquors, but the carrier is liable at least as gratuitous bailee, and, therefore, for gross negligence, in respect of handling and dealing with the trunk and its contents of a passenger, has become an insurer, negligence of the carrier need not be considered in determining the question of liability.—Hessler v. Detroit & C. Nav. Co, 170 N.Y.S. 513, 103 Misc. 551.

Checks mixed by employee of transfer company

Where a trunk was checked to the wrong place because an employee of transfer company employed by passenger attached wrong check to trunk, and trunk was in good condition when delivered to railroad company, the latter was liable for injury to trunk and for loss of articles contained therein, where the lock of the trunk was broken and the articles were stolen therefrom while in the possession of the railroad company and it gave no explanation as to how the damage occurred.—Davis v. Jones Transfer Co., 103 S.E. 520, 114 S.C. 162.

Statutory provision as to baggage retained by passenger

The provision of Act of April 11, 1867, P.L. p 69, that no railroad company providing a car, or other place, for the deposit of passengers' baggage, shall be liable for loss of, or damage to, articles or property, not there deposited by the passenger, or which he places in the car in which he is to be transported, does not apply to hand baggage given to a red cap porter to take to train, until it is redelivered to the passenger.—Booker v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 82 Pa.Super. 588.

other than the intoxicating liquors.[72]

Where certain dogs taken on a hunting expedition have been delivered to, and accepted by, the carrier, the mere fact that servants of the owner and passenger care for the dogs does not relieve the carrier of liability for the negligence of its servants in respect of custody which is the proximate cause of the death of the dogs.[73]

The liability of the carrier, as dependent on whether or not certain articles are to be regarded as baggage, is considered in certain aspects in §§ 855–861 supra; and as dependent on the carrier's duty to receive, check, and transport baggage, supra §§ 862–865.

Tourist contract. A transit agent who undertakes to furnish transportation, and to conduct tourists on a trip through a foreign country, and to "look after the baggage and all details of the trip," is not liable for the loss of a tourist's baggage by a carrier employed on the route not under the control of such agent.[74]

What law governs. A carrier's liability for a passenger's baggage is generally governed by the law of the place where the contract to carry the passenger and his baggage is made,[75] unless it appears from the face of the contract that it was made with reference to the laws of some other place[76] or unless, according to some cases, the contract is to be performed in some other place.[77] It has been held that at least so far as delivery is concerned the law of the place where the baggage is to be delivered governs,[78] and that, where the contract is made in a foreign country, but there is no evidence as to the law of such country, the law of the forum governs.[79]

The rights and liabilities of an interstate passenger and the carrier in case of a loss of baggage depend on federal legislation, the agreement between the parties, and common-law principles, as accepted and enforced in federal courts.[80] The Interstate Commerce Act did not apply, however, to an interstate transportation of baggage by motor bus which occurred prior to the enactment of federal legislation regulating transportation by motor carriers.[81]

§ 868. Loss by Act of God or Public Enemy

A carrier is not liable for loss of baggage caused by an act of God, a public enemy, or an inevitable accident, in the absence of negligence of the carrier which contributes to the loss

The liability of a common carrier for baggage does not embrace losses caused by the act of God or a public enemy,[82] it is a complete defense to an action for the loss of baggage to show that the loss was occasioned by an inevitable accident.[83] If, however, the negligence of the carrier contributes to the loss, although caused primarily by an act of God, the carrier will be liable.[84]

§ 869. Where Passenger Retains Custody of His Baggage

Where a passenger voluntarily retains possession and control of his baggage, the carrier is not liable as a common carrier or as insurer in respect of such baggage, but is liable only for the negligence or fault of itself or its servants which causes the loss of, or injury to, such baggage.

While a carrier of passengers may become such a bailee of the baggage of a passenger as to have, with reference to such baggage, the liability of a common carrier of goods, as shown supra § 867, the passenger has the right to retain in his possession and under his control, and to have carried as a part of the transaction, a reasonable quantity of personal baggage appropriate to the journey, as shown supra § 862. This right of the passenger, however, to take personal belongings and other articles with him into the cars or other vehicles of conveyance is subject to reasonable regulation, not only as to what may be thus taken, as shown supra § 862, but also as to how far the carrier will be liable for articles retained by the passenger under his control.[85] A carrier may be liable where its servants use improper means to prevent the retention in the car by the passenger of articles which he is not entitled to carry.[86]

In order to fix or impose a common carrier's liability as insurer, there must in general be a delivery or surrender of the complete and exclusive care, possession, custody, and control of the baggage to the carrier, and, in the absence of such delivery or surrender, there is in general no liability except for negligence.[87] In the absence of a special agreement, a carrier does not assume control of such money or other personal effects as its passengers may bring into its vehicle of carriage;[88] the carrier, in such cases, does not assume the liability of a common carrier or insurer, its duty is merely to exercise reasonable care to protect such effects from loss or injury, and it becomes liable only for the failure of itself or its servants to exercise such reasonable care.[89] While there is authority for the

Liability of carrier as bailee for hire

Ala.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Dickson, 73 So. 750, 15 Ala.App. 423, certiorari denied 74 So. 1005, 199 Ala. 699.

Voluntary retention of possession

A carrier is not liable as insurer in respect of jewelry in the passengers' possession as baggage if, having made a rule requiring jewelry to be intrusted to it for safekeeping, the passenger chooses to retain possession.—Borden v. New York Cent. R. Co., 162 N.Y.S. 1099, 98 Misc. 574.

Complete or partial possession and control retained by passenger

Where a passenger on a railroad train carries his hand bag into the car with him and retains the entire or partial possession and control of it, the carrier will not be responsible for the loss unless negligence on the part of the carrier or its servants is shown.—Burnett v. Riter, Tex.Civ.App., 276 S.W. 347.

Duty to protect passenger's possession

While the owner of a package has possession of it in a car, the carrier is obligated to use reasonable and ordinary care and watchfulness to protect such possession as against other passengers and persons.—Foulke v. New York Consol. R. Co., 127 N.E. 237, 228 N.Y. 269, 9 A.L.

view that no liability attaches to a carrier by bus in connection with the handing out of hand baggage by its servants to passengers who have alighted,[90] it has been held that the carrier may be liable for the negligence of its servants in this regard.[91] This liability extends to loss occurring through an employee while acting within the scope of his employment in carrying a passenger's baggage to or from the train,[92] but does not extend to large sums of money or other property of exceptional value retained by the passenger in his control, without the knowledge of the carrier.[93] The mere fact of a loss, without any circumstance connecting it with a failure on the part of the carrier's employees to exercise due care, is not sufficient to show that it was caused by the carrier's negligence.[94]

It has been held that the carrier becomes liable as insurer where its employee, in order to clear the aisle of a car, takes hand baggage from the custody and control of the passenger and assumes control by depositing the baggage in another part of the car.[95]

Effect of alleged of carrier's employees

Carrier was not liable to passenger for loss of fur scarf when she was disturbed by sudden physical encounter between two other passengers in subway train, although carrier failed to have guard present in car, especially where there was no showing that, even though a guard were present, he could have interfered in time to prevent the loss —Milbauer v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co., 249 N.Y.S. 726, 139 Misc. 644.

Suitcase taken while passenger absent for luncheon

Railroad company was not liable for loss of a suitcase which was placed over the seat which the passenger occupied by a porter, and which was taken from car while train stopped to permit passengers to have lunch, in absence of showing that railroad company was given actual or constructive custody of suitcase or that carrier was negligent.—Posner v. New York Cent. R. Co., 277 N.Y.S. 671, 154 Misc. 591.

Baggage cars under control of theatrical company

(1) Where a railroad company, because of the number of tickets purchased by a theatrical company, furnished the latter several cars on which the theatrical company loaded its own baggage and props, and the railroad company had nothing to do with transportation except to haul such cars, the railroad company was liable for negligence only, in respect of baggage in such cars — Globe & Rutgers Fire Ins. Co. v. Winter Garden Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 9 F.2d 227, certiorari denied 46 S.Ct. 352, 270 U.S. 654, 70 L.Ed. 782.

(2) Where the manager of a theatrical company made a contract with a railroad company for the lease of baggage cars for the transportation of properties and effects to be used in a theatrical production and there was an express agreement that the railroad company was not to be considered a common carrier nor liable as such and that the theatrical company should assign a man to safeguard its effects while in the car, such manager was not entitled to recover for the loss of a trunk containing his personal property which was placed in one of the baggage cars by his agent.—McKeon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 164 N.Y.S. 312, 177 App.Div. 462.

Taxicab

Taxicab company was liable for a loss of merchandise where its driver permitted a stranger to enter its taxicab and ride away with such merchandise, which had been placed in the taxicab by plaintiff's employee who had intended to become a passenger. Taxicab driver, permitting cab to be loaded with merchandise as accommodation to passenger, must exercise due care to prevent theft thereof.—Barr & Shoulberg v. Yellow Taxi Corporation, 265 N.Y.S. 754, 148 Misc. 855, affirmed 273 N.Y.S. 754, 152 Misc. 293

Proximate cause of loss

Where a passenger, who was placed in a dark and crowded car, lost his baggage and the carrier had reason to know that the car would be crowded at that time, the darkness may be deemed the proximate cause of the loss.—Keith v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 99 S.E. 812, 112 S.C. 297

Failure to deliver to proper passenger

(1) Where hand baggage of a passenger which has not been under the exclusive control of a carrier by bus is taken under the control of the carrier's driver, so that it may be handed to passengers who have alighted from the bus, the carrier becomes a bailee and is liable as such and not as an insurer, and in such case the carrier is liable only for negligence in failing to make due delivery.—Blair v. Pennsylvania Greyhound Lines, 267 N.W. 578, 275 Mich. 636

(2) While driver of bus, who had told passengers to alight and that he would hand out the baggage, was under no legal duty manually to deliver particular baggage to the passenger to whom it belonged or into the custody of such passenger, if the baggage was handed out and a passenger's failure to claim his baggage or to receive it was due to the negligence of the carrier's servant, the carrier was liable.—Blair v. Pennsylvania Greyhound Lines, supra.

Conductor assisting passenger

Conductor, when he took possession of passenger's hand bag and carried it out of coach to assist her to alight, acted within scope of authority, and for his negligence company was liable.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Barksdale, 124 S.E. 362, 32 Ga.App. 643

Basis of rule is that, under the ordinary contract of carriage, the carrier assumes no obligation by its contract as to articles which form no part of the passenger's ordinary luggage or personal effects.—Pinkus v. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 114 N.E. 36, 65 Ind.App. 38

sengers neglect or refuse to have their luggage checked and transported in a regular baggage car, it is carried at their risk, baggage which is not checked by the passenger and is received into the coach in which he is riding is carried at his risk, notwithstanding a porter aids the passenger by lifting the baggage into the coach.[96] A statutory provision that a carrier by motor vehicle shall be liable for loss or damage to baggage only when checked with the operator of the vehicle does not preclude a recovery for baggage which has not been checked and is retained by the passenger where the passenger leaves the vehicle without taking his baggage, pursuant to the invitation of the carrier's employee, and the vehicle makes a stop at an intermediate point.[97]

The view has been expressed that if a carrier refuses to take into its custody for transportation as baggage property properly transportable as baggage so that the passenger is compelled to retain custody while on the carrier's train, the passenger may hold the carrier to an insurer's liability in respect of such property.[98]

Baggage on rack or shelf in bus. A carrier by bus is not liable as a common carrier or as insurer for the loss of baggage placed on an open shelf or rack inside the bus above the seats whether the baggage was placed there by the passenger or by an employee or agent of the carrier, even though the baggage is not in plain view of the passenger while seated in the bus, since there is not a delivery to the carrier of complete care, custody, and control of the baggage, which is an essential element of the carrier's liability as common carrier or insurer, and, in such case, the carrier is not liable, if at all, except where there is negligence.[99] On the other hand, the carrier has been regarded as a bailee of hand baggage which is carried in a rack attached to the running board; such carrier is not an insurer, but, as bailee, is under the duty to exercise reasonable care.[1]

Custom or usage of carrier. A usage or custom to allow passengers to carry packages of merchandise in passenger cars, in derogation of the common-law contract of carriage, must be so general, certain, uniform, and notorious, that it can be concluded that the officers and agents of such company possessed knowledge of such usage, and acquiesced therein, in such manner that it became a part of the contract of carriage;[2] if such usage has been so acquiesced in as to amount to a regulation, the carrier can resume its rights under the law only after reasonable notice of its rescission of the regulation.[3]

Articles left in conveyance by passenger. Where the passenger leaves his baggage on his seat in the train, forgetting to take it with him on leaving the train at his destination, and it is afterward lost or stolen, he generally cannot hold the carrier liable for its loss.[4] If, however, he can show that the wrongful conduct of the carrier's employees was the proximate cause of the loss, either by their failing to take care of his baggage after full knowledge of the facts or in any other way, he may hold the carrier responsible.[5] A package forgotten and left in a car by a passenger is in the custody and potential actual possession of the carrier, and it is the right and duty of the carrier to become, as to it and the owner, a gratuitous bailee, and this involves the right and duty to have possession and to use the care of a gratuitous bailee until the owner should call for the package.[6]

Where a carrier undertakes to provide a place for the safe-keeping of articles that may be inadvertently left by passengers on its cars, and makes it the duty of its employees to take charge of such articles, it will be deemed a part of its business to take and keep charge of such articles until called for by the owner.[7]

§ 870. Passenger Not Accompanying Baggage

While according to some cases a carrier is liable only as a gratuitous bailee if, through the fault of the passenger, the baggage is not transported on the conveyance on which the passenger travels and no extra compensation is paid, there is authority for the view that the fact that the passenger fails to travel on the same conveyance does not relieve the carrier of its liability as a carrier of baggage.

According to some cases, the undertaking of the carrier is to carry the passenger, and with him his reasonable baggage and, if through the passenger's fault the baggage does not go on the same conveyance with him, it must go as freight, and the carrier is entitled to added compensation therefor;[8] and, if no added compensation is paid, the contract is one of bailment for the benefit of the passenger as bailor, and the carrier's liability is that of a gratuitous bailee only.[9] The fact that baggage is carried on a train other than that on which the passenger travels does not, however, under all circumstances, relieve the carrier of liability as insurer in respect of such baggage, or of liability to the same extent as though the baggage were carried on the train on which the passenger travels.[10] Where the failure of the baggage to go on the same train with the passenger is due to the fault of the carrier, where, for any cause within the control and supervision of the carrier, the baggage is carried on another train, where the carrier expressly or impliedly consents that it shall go on a different train, or where baggage is checked through over different lines and the connection is so close at some point that there is not time to transfer the baggage to the train taken by the passenger, the liability of the carrier is the same as in cases where the baggage is carried on the same train with the passenger.[11] According to some cases, the carrier is liable as such for a passenger's baggage, whether the passenger's failure to go on the same train with it is caused by the carrier or the passenger;[12] and it has been held that this rule applies, even though the passenger did not use the ticket on which the baggage was checked.[13] So, there is authority for

Ticket not used and destroyed

Where one purchased ticket from defendant railroad company and checked her baggage to large city in order to take one of its through trains to her destination from such city, but traveled to such city over a different railroad, where she purchased a ticket for her destination and exchanged baggage checks, without any intent to defraud or deceive defendant, having destroyed the ticket on which the baggage was first checked, and the baggage was stolen at the depot where it was first checked, the carrier was liable for its loss as an insurer, and not as a mere warehouseman or gratuitous bailee.—Caine v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 185 N.W. 765, 217 Mich. 231, 23 A.L.R. 1442—Marshall v. Pontiac, etc., R. Co., 85 N.W. 242, 126 Mich. 45, 55 L.R.A. 650.

Intent not to use

It has been held that the carrier

the view that the mere fact that a passenger does not travel immediately to his destination over the same route over which his baggage is checked but, at an intermediate point, takes a side trip to a place in another state not on said route, does not affect the liability of the carrier in respect of such baggage.[14]

In the case of baggage consisting of articles used by a man, his wife, and their child, the view has been taken that the husband and father is sufficiently represented by his wife, as affecting the liability of the carrier, where the wife and child travel on the train on which the baggage is carried, notwithstanding the husband travels on a different train.[15]

A carrier's practice of giving checks in exchange for transfer company checks amounts to an agreement to receive the baggage when it arrives and to check it to its destination seasonably, and contemplates that it may not go by the train the passenger takes; hence the carrier's liability for the baggage so checked is not lessened because it does not go on the same train.[16]

Where the passenger and the carrier specially stipulate that his baggage will be transported only over such lines and between such stations as the passenger will travel on the same date, the contract controls, and if the passenger intentionally fails to travel on the same day with his baggage, the liability of the carrier for the baggage is that of a gratuitous bailee.[17]

§ 871. Conversion

In general, a carrier is liable where there is a conversion of a passenger's baggage by the carrier's employees or by a stranger.

The carrier is liable for the conversion of a passenger's baggage by its servants or agents, or by a stranger, where it results from a want of due care on the carrier's part,[18] and for a misdelivery of the baggage of a passenger the carrier will be liable as for conversion,[19] even though such misdelivery is made by reason of mistake or gross imposition or on a forged order.[20] In regard to articles stolen from the trunk of a passenger by an employee of the carrier, it has been held, however, that, where, under the particular circumstances, the common-law liability as carrier does not exist, and it is not liable on the contract of carriage in respect of such articles, the carrier is not liable as for conversion if it has no knowledge of the fact that such articles are in the trunk.[21]

Notwithstanding there has been a conversion of baggage, the passenger may lose or waive his right to recover more than nominal damages by voluntarily resuming control over the baggage,[22] but, after an action to recover for loss of baggage has been commenced and defendant's answer has been filed, plaintiff is not bound to accept a tender of the baggage.[23]

Reason for rule

The necessary element of dominion over the converted property, in order to render the carrier liable in trover as for conversion, was lacking in view of the fact that the carrier did not have knowledge that the converted property was in the trunk; knowledge of such fact on the part of carrier's servant who stole the property was not imputable to the carrier because the presumption was that such servant would not communicate such fact to the carrier.—Illinois Cent. § 872. Delay

Delay in transporting and delivering baggage will ordinarily render the carrier liable for the resultant injury

The carrier is ordinarily liable for delay in transporting and delivering baggage, whether or not the baggage itself is injured[24] Although it has been held that the carrier is not bound to carry the baggage on the same train with the passenger but merely to transport it within a reasonable time,[25] where the baggage is delivered to the carrier in proper season, it is generally its duty to transport it on the same train with the passenger,[26] or on one which permits delivery at the time the passenger reaches his destination,[27] and a failure so to do constitutes negligence, unless there is some agreement or a sufficient excuse therefor,[28] as where the passenger gives some direction, or does something, or omits to do something which authorizes the carrier to send the baggage on some other train.[29]

Under some statutes, a passenger is entitled to recover from the carrier a penalty for delay in transporting baggage[30]

§ 873. Contributory Negligence

The contributory negligence of a passenger may defeat his right to recover for injury to, or loss of, baggage.

A passenger is obliged to exercise reasonable care in respect of his property which he takes with him,[31] and in general where a passenger has been guilty of negligence which contributes to the delay of, or loss of, or injury to, his baggage he cannot recover therefor[32] So, in case of loss to baggage retained by a passenger in his own custody, the carrier may defend on the ground that the proximate cause of the loss was the passenger's own negligence; the rule in this connection is the same as in others, and no liability exists on the part of the carrier, even when some want of care is shown, where the proximate cause of the loss complained of is the passenger's own want of care.[33]

While it has been stated broadly that, where a carrier has obtained exclusive possession of a passenger's baggage and thereby becomes an insurer, contributory negligence is not to be considered,[34] where baggage is checked to the wrong station, the passenger's failure to read a check given to him which would have disclosed the mistake is such contributory negligence as will defeat a recovery for delay in its return to him.[35]

§ 874. Limitation of Liability

In the absence of statutory or constitutional provisions to the contrary, the liability of a carrier as insurer of baggage may be limited by a fair and reasonable agreement between the carrier and the passenger.

The general liability of a carrier for the baggage of a passenger intrusted to its care, as in the transportation of other goods, is that of an insurer, as shown supra § 867, it being liable, at common law, to the full extent of the passenger's loss of, or injury to, his baggage,[36] provided the loss of injury is with respect to articles which properly constitute baggage.[37] However, except in so far as there is a statutory provision to the contrary,[38] this com-

Baggage not in actual or constructive custody of carrier
Where a carrier did not have actual or constructive custody of baggage which a passenger had taken into a train, so that the carrier was not chargeable as bailee, it was unnecessary to consider the question as to the contributory negligence of the passenger whose baggage was missing when she returned to the train after leaving the train for luncheon at an intermediate station.—Posner v New York Cent. mon-law obligation may be limited by a fair and reasonable agreement between the carrier and the passenger against loss or damage not resulting from the negligence of the carrier or its employees,[39] provided, according to some cases, an independent consideration, such as a reduced rate of fare, is given for such limitation;[40] and in some jurisdictions a contract for limitation of liability is authorized by statute.[41] Subject to limitations and qualifications as to assent of the passenger and as to the effect of a public notice, recognized in some cases and considered infra § 877, a carrier may, by a reasonable regulation brought to the notice of the passenger, requiring disclosure of exceptional value or compliance with other reasonable conditions, limit its liability,[42] but in general the passenger must have notice of the regulation[43] and an opportunity to comply with it.[44]

Limitation of liability of carriers for an interstate passenger's baggage is covered by the Interstate Commerce Act and amendments thereto,[45] and limitation of liability, to some extent at least, by published tariff, is permissible under the Carmack Amendment, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11),[46] and this rule was not altered by the Cummins Amendment, as amended 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11).[47] A carrier should not use doubtful language where it seeks to limit its common-law liability in respect of the interstate transportation of baggage.[48]

Regulations or stipulations relied on as limiting the carrier's liability must be reasonable,[49] and whether or not a particular regulation is reasonable is generally a question of fact which must be determined from the circumstances of each case, as shown infra § 899. Such regulation also must not be inconsistent with any statute or with the duty of the carrier to the public,[50] and a carrier may not by rule or regulation relieve itself of liability imposed by statute where the statute prohibits such exemption from liability in this regard.[51]

Limitation as to train. A stipulation in a ticket sold at a reduced rate that the passenger's baggage shall be carried only over such lines and between such stations as the passenger shall travel on the day the baggage is presented for checking is valid, and releases the carrier from liability, as a carrier, for the loss of baggage where the passenger does not intend to, and does not, travel in accordance with the stipulation,[52] and, it seems, under some circumstances, releases the carrier from liability, as a carrier, for the loss of baggage carried on a train on which the passenger does not intend to,

and, does not, travel, unless the stipulation is waived;[53] and such a stipulation is not invalidated by a custom of passengers not to travel with their baggage when checked, unless the carrier has knowledge of such custom, but it does not release the carrier from liability for baggage carried on a different train by accident, or for baggage carried on a regular baggage train, or where the carrier chooses not to forward the baggage on the passenger's train.[54]

Transportation of dogs. A passenger is not in general bound by a rule or regulation as to the carriage of dogs of which he has no knowledge.[55]

§ 875. As to Amount or Value of Baggage

Subject to certain restrictions, a carrier may, by contract, limit its liability to a specified amount or on the basis of an agreed value of the baggage.

While, in the absence of legislative enactment, the law does not prescribe any definite limit to the amount or value of baggage beyond which a carrier is not liable,[56] a carrier is usually required to carry as baggage for a particular passenger, and to assume liability as insurer in respect of, such articles only as, in quantity and value, do not exceed such as are ordinarily or usually carried by passengers of like station who proceed on like journeys,[57] and, subject to certain restrictions as to the nature of the liability recognized in some cases and considered infra § 876, a carrier may specially contract that it will be liable for a prescribed amount, and no more, provided such limitation is not unreasonable,[58] or may by contract limit its liability to a value agreed on for the purpose of fixing the rate for which the baggage is to be carried.[59] So reasonable regulations or notices, limiting the carrier's liability for baggage to a certain amount, unless its value is disclosed and an additional payment made for the excess over the amount named, have generally been regarded as valid when brought to the knowledge of the passenger,[60] or when passenger may be presumed to have knowledge,[61] but as a general rule the assent of the passenger is necessary in order to render a regulation or notice binding, as shown infra § 877. A valid regulation of a state regulatory body, adopted pursuant to statutory authorization, which fixes liability based on value will be given effect in a case in which such regulation is properly applicable.[62]

According to some cases, a limitation of liability to a certain amount or one which is based on the valuation of the property is not available to the carrier where there is a conversion of the baggage by the carrier,[63] or where the loss is caused by the carrier's negligence, as shown infra § 876.

Special contract

The better rule is that a carrier which does not assume to act as such in the carriage of dogs on passenger trains, but which, on the request of a passenger, consents to carry a dog on a particular occasion, cannot be held liable as a common carrier for the subsequent loss of the dog while under its charge, although the carrier's agent may have been paid something for the carriage of the dog. The action, if any lies, is on the private, special contract, and not on any undertaking imposed by the common law on carriers.—Honeyman v. Oregon, etc., R. Intra-state and interstate shipments compared

In respect of intra-state transportation, a carrier converting an article intrusted to it by delivery to wrong person thereby in effect abandons its contract with the shipper and cannot thereafter rely upon the provisions of such contract to limit its liability; but under the federal law misdelivery is not deemed a conversion depriving a carrier of the benefit of a limitation of liability.—Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Boone, 46 S.Ct. 341, 270 U.S. 466, 70 L.Ed. 688, affirming Boone v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., Mo., 263 S.W. 495, certiorari granted Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Boone, 45 S.Ct. 196, 266 U.S. 600, 69 L.Ed. 461.

Failure of a passenger to declare excess value and to pay excess charges at the time the baggage was checked does not permit the carrier to claim the benefit of a limitation as to the amount for which it is liable where the carrier's employee declined the passenger's offer to declare the excess value at the time of checking and the passenger was, and remains, willing to pay the excess charges and tenders payment in his pleading.[64] A rule or regulation that a railroad carrier shall not be liable in excess of a specified amount unless a greater value is declared when the baggage is received by the carrier or its agents does not apply so as to limit the liability of a terminal carrier to which the owner had delivered certain baggage to be held until called for, where, when the owner or his agent applies for such baggage in order to have it transported by the railroad carrier, the baggage has already been lost.[65]

A limitation of the amount of baggage which a passenger is entitled to have carried does not in general restrict or affect his common-law right to carry personal baggage with him,[66] but merely limits the accommodation which the passenger may have with respect to baggage committed to the custody of the carrier.[67]

Regulations promulgated by the director general of railroads which provided for limitation of liability based on the value of the baggage, during the federal war-time control of railroads, were upheld as valid and binding, even in respect of baggage transported between points in the same state.[68]

Statutory provisions which authorize a carrier to limit liability on the basis of value or recognize the carrier's right in this regard are given effect in accordance with their terms duly construed.[69] While the view has been taken that a statute which in general terms declares that the carrier shall be liable in respect of property carried as baggage up to the full value and regardless of its character, but which provides that the value in excess of a specified amount shall be stated and that the carrier may make a reasonable charge for the assumption of such liability in excess of said amount, does not effect a limitation of liability to such amount where the value is not stated,[70] a carrier may, by filing a schedule of rates and charges, containing a limitation in accordance with such statutory provision, with a public regulatory body, pursuant to the provisions of another statute, effect a limitation of liability.[71] In order successfully to claim the benefit of some statutes permitting limitation, the carrier must, by publication of schedules or otherwise, bring itself within the provisions of the statute.[72]

Statutory restriction or prohibition. An attempted limitation based on value is not available where it is in conflict with a governing statute.[73] In general a state statute that common carriers shall not limit or restrict their liability as it exists at common law, prevents a limitation based on the value of baggage transported between points within the state; a state statute which prohibits or prevents, either in all cases[74] or under the particular circumstances involved,[75] the giving effect to such a limitation applies and renders ineffective such a limitation in respect of the intra-state transportation of baggage over a railroad line after the expiration of federal war-time control of such line, notwithstanding the operation of such statute was suspended during the period of such control, and it is not necessary that such statute should be reënacted after the expiration of such control in order to give it operative effect. During the period of federal war-time control, however, a regulation promulgated by the director general of railroads which provided for such a limitation was valid and binding in respect of intra-state transportation notwithstanding a state statute prohibited such a limitation.[76]

Limitations as to interstate transportation. Under the Interstate Commerce Act as amended by the Carmack Amendment and subsequent amendments, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11), a carrier subject to the provisions of such statutes may, by due compliance with the applicable provisions in respect of filing of tariffs with the interstate commerce commission, limit its liability in respect of baggage transported in interstate commerce, on the basis of the value of the baggage,[77] and there is no distinction in this regard as to limitation of liability for loss of, or damage to, baggage in custody of carriers under contracts for transportation and such limitation in respect of baggage after transportation has actually been commenced.[78] An interstate passenger who consents to the lower of two alternative rates for the transportation of checked baggage, which are based on different values, is, in the event of a loss, estopped to recover more than the amount of the valuation on which the lower rate is based.[79]

A limitation of liability imposed by a tariff under regulations of the interstate commerce commission which in terms refers to baggage which is delivered to the carrier and checked does not apply to hand baggage taken into a coach by the passenger and generally retained in his possession.[80] A limitation of liability to a certain amount contained in an interstate tariff does not apply where the passenger, after completing a journey under a ticket covering interstate transportation, takes an intra-state journey, purchases a ticket therefor, rechecks his baggage on such ticket, without obtaining physical delivery, and the loss occurs after completion of interstate transportation.[81]

Amendment to Cummins amendment

(1) The Cummins amendment, Act of March 4, 1915, as amended by Act of Aug. 9, 1916, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20(11) did not alter the rule that, under the Carmack amendment, carriers may limit liability on the basis of value in respect of the baggage of passengers carried in interstate commerce.—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Woodbury, 41 S.Ct. 114, 254 U.S. 357, 65 L.Ed. 301, reversing Woodbury v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 209 S.W. 432.

(2) Such Act of Aug. 9, 1916, expressly exempted baggage from the provisions of the Cummins amendment, so that railroad company's limitation of liability to a specified amount contained in a tariff filed with the interstate commerce commission and duly approved by the federal director general of railroads, was in effect at the time of loss, and restricted the passenger's recovery to such amount.—Culbreth v. Martin, 103 S.E. 374, 179 N.C. 678

Property carried for United States government

A duly published tariff authorized by a federal statute, containing a provision for the limitation of the liability of the carrier to a specified amount for the military kit of an enlisted man if a greater value is not declared applies where the United States government seeks to recover from the carrier for the loss of the kit of an enlisted man, which was carried as baggage in connection with his transportation pursuant to a government request.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. U. S., 62 Ct.Cl. 449.

Terminal association, as agent of railroad company, was entitled to benefit of provision for limitation of liability in railroad company's tariff filed with interstate commerce commission where contract of railroad company for interstate transportation of baggage provided for holding of baggage for application of passenger for twenty-four hours after arrival of baggage and the loss occurred in the hands of such association within such twenty-four hour period.—Treadway v. Terminal R. R. Ass'n of St. Louis, Mo.App., 84 S.W.2d 143.

The words "carried on passenger trains" used in the proviso inserted by the amendment of Aug. 9, 1916, 39 U.S.St. at L. p. 441 c. 301, was intended to apply generally to carriers using such means of transporting passengers and their baggage.—Jester v. Lancaster, Tex.Civ.App., 266 S.W. 1103

Injury in baggage room or shed

Deposit by transfer company and receipt by railroad company of trunks in good faith for immediate transportation and its due embarkation in transit to another state, after being checked on passenger's ticket, constituted act of "interstate commerce," and recovery for damage to baggage from rain in railroad company's baggage room or shed before shipment was limited by tariff on file with interstate commerce commission.—Gus Mayer Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 153 So. 249, 228 Ala. 290.

81. S.C.—Herndon v. Southern Ry. Co., 111 S.E. 13, 118 S.C. 466.

In respect of interstate carriers over whose business congress has not exercised its power of regulation, a regulation of a state regulatory body, duly adopted pursuant to statute, fixing a limitation as to the liability of such a carrier based on the value of the baggage has been given effect.[82]

Waiver. The requirement of a statute that the value of baggage in excess of a specified amount shall be stated in order to enable the carrier to charge for the assumption of additional liability, being for the benefit of the carrier, may be waived by it, and the liability of the carrier is not limited to such specified amount where such requirement is waived; according to some cases waiver may be effected in such case by failure of the carrier to inquire as to value and its direction to its agents in its published tariffs not to make such inquiry,[83] or by failure to inquire as to value and to make additional charges,[84] but it has been held that, where the carrier has duly filed a schedule of rates and charges containing a limitation in accordance with the above statutory provision, with a public regulatory body, pursuant to the provisions of another statute, a waiver is not effected by a failure of a local agent to make inquiry as to value.[85] A passenger may not successfully claim that a limitation has been waived where it does not appear that the agent or employee with whom the passenger dealt had authority to waive such limitation.[86]

Stipulation for limitation as basis of right to recover. A passenger may not successfully rely on a stipulation in a block ticket by virtue of which he travels, limiting liability of the carrier for baggage to a specified amount unless a greater value is declared, to recover for loss of his personal property to the extent of the amount specified in the stipulation where the passenger does not deliver his property to the carrier for transportation as personal baggage but attempts to have it carried under a different and distinct contract.[87]

§ 876. As to Character of Liability

While a carrier may, by employing the proper method, limit its liability as insurer, it may not in general relieve itself of all liability caused by its negligence or wrongdoing or that of its employees.

The general rule is that a carrier may, by special contract or by a notice assented to by the passenger, limit its liability as insurer,[88] but that it cannot stipulate for exemption from all liability for losses caused by its own negligence or wrongdoing, or that of its servants or agents,[89] and, subject to certain qualifications or limitations hereinafter discussed, cannot, by stipulation, or provision in a tariff, limit or curtail its liability for loss or injury caused by such negligence.[90] Statutory provisions declaring invalid agreements for exemption or exoneration of carriers for loss or injury occasioned by negligence or faults of the carrier or its servants are given effect in accordance with their terms duly construed.[91] Some statutes placing a limit on the amount for which a carrier will be liable or authorizing a carrier to make such limitation do not apply to liability based on negligence.[92]

A carrier may not, as a general rule, impose

a limitation, without qualification, against liability beyond a specified amount in respect of loss of baggage caused by the negligence of itself or of its servants; accordingly a carrier is usually liable for the full value of the baggage in such case without regard to such limitation.[93]

There is authority for the view that a like rule applies, in respect of liability based on negligence, where there is a provision for limitation to a specified amount unless a greater value is declared and excess charges are paid.[94] It has been held or recognized, however, that a valid stipulation or regulation by which the charges are graduated according to the value of the baggage as fixed by the passenger and liability is in effect limited accordingly may be given effect even where the loss is caused by the negligence of the carrier,[95] at least where the transportation involved is interstate.[96] This rule, or qualification of the general rule against limitation of liability for negligence, is, according to some cases, based on the doctrine of estoppel,[97] that is, the passenger is estopped to claim a greater amount than the value which he has placed on his baggage.[98] A stipulation which limits the liability of a carrier to a specified amount unless a greater valuation is declared and an extra charge is paid is binding even in respect of a loss due to negligence where such stipulation is made in accordance with the requirement of a valid regulation by a public regulatory body, adopted by such body pursuant to authority conferred by statute.[99]

In respect of hand baggage checked by a traveler in a parcel room of a railroad company, a provision in the contract that the company shall not be responsible in excess of a specified amount has been held to be available to the carrier even in the case of negligence, on the theory that a limitation according to an agreed value does not contravene the principle that one cannot contract for exemption or limitation of liability for his own negligence.[1]

In New York, according to some cases, a carrier may by express stipulation limit or exempt itself from liability for the loss of goods occurring even from the negligence of its agents or servants,[2]

Hand baggage carried by porter

Notwithstanding a railroad company's tariff provided that, where red cap porter service is provided, hand baggage will be handled without charge by red cap porters to and from trains, and that liability on hand baggage so handled will be limited to a specified amount, it was held that, where hand baggage was lost through the negligence of a red cap porter to whom possession was delivered by the passenger with instructions to deliver such baggage on the train, the foregoing limitation did not prevent a recovery for full value. This rule was applied notwithstanding the passenger's journey was an interstate journey and the carrier had filed the above tariff provision with the interstate commerce commission.—Franklin v. Southern Pac. Co., 265 P. 936, 203 Cal. 680, 59 A.L.R. 118, certiorari denied Southern Pac. Co. v. Franklin, 49 S.Ct. 24, 278 U.S. 621, 73 L.Ed. 542.

Terminal company

In an action against a terminal company for failure to deliver baggage, in which the terminal company entered a plea to the effect that, under a provision of the contract involved, it would be liable in a specified sum only, it was held that defendant could not by contract relieve itself of its common-law liability for its own negligence.—Birmingham Terminal Co. v. and a limitation by contract to a value agreed on for the purpose of fixing the rate is effective even where the loss is due to the carrier's negligence.[3] A contract is not in general to be deemed to include a carrier's own negligence by any general words, nor unless it in clear and explicit form embraces such negligence,[4] and a clause simply releasing a carrier from liability for loss of goods will not include a case of its own negligence unless such exemption is expressly and plainly stated; but a clause in consideration of reduced rates, properly and reasonably limiting the liability of a carrier to a specified valuation of the goods received by it, will include a case of loss or damage arising from its own negligence without express mention thereof.[5]

Limitation in pass. It has been held that the fact that the passenger is using a free pass, which contains the limitation, does not alter the rule against limiting liability for negligence,[6] but there are also cases holding the contrary.[7]

§ 877. Necessity of Special Contract or Notice to Passenger

As a general rule the liability of a carrier in respect of baggage may be limited or restricted only by special contract or by notice or regulation duly assented to, or accepted by, the passenger, assent or acceptance may appear by implication. Tariffs containing provisions for limitation, duly filed with the interstate commerce commission, are binding or interstate passengers even in the absence of actual knowledge of such provisions on their part.

As a general rule, in the absence of statutory modification or qualification, a carrier can restrict its common-law liability only by a special contract with the passenger, or by a notice or regulation brought to the passenger's knowledge, and assented to or accepted by him, expressly or impliedly.[8] The ordinary passenger ticket, as shown above in § 603, does not purport to set forth the terms of the contract between the passenger and the carrier, and is merely evidence of the right to transportation; and, according to some cases, stipulations limiting the carrier's liability as to baggage, embodied in, or printed on, such a ticket are not prima facie binding on the passenger, and, to constitute limitation of the carrier's liability, such stipulations must be shown to have been known to, and accepted by, him.[9] In any event a passenger is not necessarily chargeable, as a matter of law, with a notice of limitation appearing on a ticket, so as to bind the passenger, and due consideration must be given to the form of the notice and its position on the ticket.[10] The usual receipt or check for baggage issued to a passenger does not, as shown supra § 866, embody the contract of carriage, and limitations set forth in baggage checks or receipts do not necessarily constitute a contract binding on the passenger.[11] So also it has been held that a person who checks hand baggage in a check or parcel room of a railroad company for safe-keeping is not bound by a printed notice on the check which purports to limit liability to a specified amount, unless such

General limitation as to value

A mere general limitation as to value, expressed in a printed form of contract, intended to be applicable to the baggage of all passengers using that form of ticket, even though signed by the carrier and the purchaser of the ticket, is not a bona fide agreement as to the value of the particular baggage, and amounts to no more than an arbitrary preadjustment of damages.—Southern R. person has knowledge of the limitation and assents to it.[12] A ticket, however, which purports to set out the terms of the transportation of the passenger and his baggage may be deemed a contract, and the passenger may be bound by valid limitations of liability as to baggage plainly incorporated therein,[13] the presumption being, according to some cases, as shown infra § 897, that the person accepting it does so with knowledge of its contents and with the intention to be bound thereby. So the view has been taken that a passenger is chargeable with notice, and bound by a limitation in the ticket, where he has had the ticket in his possession for some time,[14] or where the stipulations are printed on the face of the ticket in clear and legible type,[15] or, in the absence of fraud, where he has signed the ticket, presumably after having read it and agreed to its conditions.[16] According to some cases, however, notice of the limitation must be brought home to the passenger before the train is started, and while he has an opportunity to leave the car and to remove his baggage.[17]

General public notices and filing with state regulatory body. In the absence of any statutory or other controlling rule to the contrary, a general public notice as to restrictions of a carrier's common-law liability in respect of baggage will not be binding on the passenger unless it is shown that he either expressly or impliedly assented thereto,[18] even though the passenger has knowledge of such notice.[19]

It has been held that a limitation in a schedule of rates published and filed with a state regulatory body as required by statute is not effective if not assented to by the passenger.[20] There is, however, authority for the view that a tariff or schedule filed with the proper state authorities is binding on the passenger.[21]

A carrier may not relieve itself of liability imposed by statute by any rule or regulation filed with the state regulatory body, where the statute contains an express prohibition against exemption.[22] Where an applicable statute requires that the declaration of value shall be in writing or that there shall be an agreement in writing fixing the released value, in order to permit a limitation based on value, an attempt to limit liability by a published tariff filed with a state regulatory body is not effective if there has not been due compliance with the statute requiring the declaration or agreement as to value to be in writing.[23]

In respect of intra-state transportation, a carrier may not successfully claim the benefit of provisions of a state statute that the value of baggage in excess of a specified amount shall be stated and that a reasonable charge may be made by the carrier for assuming liability in excess of such amount and for the carriage of baggage in excess of a specified weight, where the carrier has not published any schedule of charges under the provisions of the statute and has not by rule or otherwise sought to bring itself within such provisions.[24]

Want of knowledge of notice

The rule that public notice is not binding on the passenger is applicable where the passenger has no knowledge of the notice.

In Pennsylvania a carrier may limit its responsibility by a general notice, yet the terms of the notice must be clear and explicit, and the person with whom the carrier deals must be fully informed of the terms and the effect of the notice, and the limitation is to be confined to cases of special contracts, express or implied.—Camden, etc., R. Schedule filed with public utilities commission

A common carrier cannot relieve itself of liability imposed by Gen. Code § 8994-1 by any rule or regulation contained in the schedule filed by it with the state public utilities commission.—Erie R. Co. v. Steinberg, 113 N.E. 814, 94 Ohio St. 189, L.R.A.1917B 787, Ann.Cas.1917E 661.

24. Mo.—Bowles v. Payne, App., 251 S.W. 101.

It has been held, that, in the absence of any statute or rule requiring posting, the posting of notice of a regulation adopted, pursuant to statutory authorization, by a state regulatory body, limiting liability, is not required,[25] such regulation is presumed to be known to, or ascertainable by, the public, and no one is excused because of ignorance of such regulation.[26]

Regulations filed with interstate commerce commission. Under the Interstate Commerce Act as amended carriers must include in the schedule of rates filed regulations affecting passenger's baggage and the limitations of liability; and where a regulation limiting liability is so filed it is binding on the carrier and on the passenger,[27] even though the passenger has no knowledge thereof;[28] and this rule applies, in respect of a limitation based on the value of the baggage, even though the carrier does not inquire as to value.[29] The effect of permitting the carrier to file regulations as to the passenger's baggage which limit its liability except on payment of specified rates, is not to change the common-law rule that the carrier is an insurer of the safety of baggage against accidents not the act of God or the public enemy or the fault of the passenger, but the effect of such filing is to permit the carrier by such a regulation to obtain commensurate compensation for the responsibility assumed.[30]

Rule adopted by carrier under interstate commerce act

A rule of the carrier which limits or attempts to limit, its liability to a specified amount, under the Interstate Commerce Act, was not available to the carrier in view of the fact that the transportation involved was intra-state.—Bowles v. Payne, Mo App., 251 S W. 101.

But in a case which arose after the enactment of the Carmack Amendment, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11), the view was expressed that there is nothing in the Interstate Commerce Act that makes a statement of limitation of liability in a schedule enforceable by the interstate commerce commission or binding on the shipper.—Wells v. Great Northern R. Co., 114 P. 92, 116 P. 1070, 59 Or. 165, 34 L.R.A.,N.S., 818, 825.

Limitation based on value

Limitation of carriers' liability for loss of baggage based on provision for declaration of value thereof, and payment of stated excess charge for excess liability over stated value to be carried free is such a regulation, within meaning of Interstate Commerce Act that publication and filing thereof with the interstate commerce commission in schedule of rates is sufficient to give notice to passenger of such limitation.

Transportation during federal war-time control

(1) In respect of intra-state and of interstate transportation during the period of federal war-time control, a schedule or regulation promulgated by the director-general of railroads and filed with the interstate commerce commission containing a limitation of baggage liability to a specified amount, unless a greater value was declared by the owner and excess charges paid, was notice of such limitation, and governed the amount recoverable in case of loss, even though the passenger had no knowledge of the existence of the schedule or regulation.

Tariff covering intra-state shipment

It has been held that a tariff filed with the interstate commerce commission, which covered both interstate and intra-state shipments and which contained a limitation as to baggage based on value, was binding on a passenger in respect of an intra-state shipment, even though the passenger did not know of such tariff and did not consciously make an agreement as to value and limitation The mere failure to post notice as to where the tariff might be examined under a provision of N. Y Public Service Commissions L. § 28 did not affect the rule, even assuming that such provision was applicable to the tariff in question—Minturn v. New York Cent. R. Co., 220 N.Y S 789, 220 App.Div. 222.

§ 878. Construction of Special Contracts or Regulations; What Law Governs

A contract or regulation limiting the liability of a carrier is to be construed most strongly against the carrier

A contract or regulation limiting the liability of the carrier for baggage, being in derogation of the common law, is to be construed most strongly against the carrier,[31] and in the light of public policy.[32] The rule does not mean, however, that the contract or regulation is to be construed unreasonably, or that its effect is to be annulled by construction where its provisions are plain and admit of no question;[33] it is to be construed not only by its conditions, but also by the circumstances of the particular case.[34] "Wearing apparel," as used in a stipulation for limitation of liability includes articles of jewelry in ordinary use suitable to the station and condition in life of the passenger.[35]

What law governs. While, according to some cases, the validity and construction of a contract limiting liability is to be governed by the law of the place where the contract is made,[36] it has been held, in respect of an interstate transportation of baggage by motor bus which occurred prior to the enactment of federal legislation regulating transportation by motor carriers, that the law of the state in which the passenger's journey terminated and in which a public regulatory body had adopted a valid regulation fixing liability on the basis of value could be given effect in view of the fact that the contract was partly performed in that state.[37]

§ 879. Notice to Carrier of Nature and Value of Baggage

In the absence of a regulation requiring the disclosure of the nature and value of property offered as baggage, the passenger's failure to make such disclosure does not relieve the carrier of liability as a carrier of baggage, at least in the absence of wrongful concealment.

In the absence of any regulation, of the carrier that a passenger shall declare the value and character of the property offered by him as baggage, on a reasonable request therefor, the passenger is not bound to make such a declaration, and, if the carrier accepts the property without inquiry as to its character or value, in general it becomes liable for the loss of so much of it as properly constitutes baggage, although it might have properly refused to carry all of it.[38] The carrier may, however, make and enforce a regulation requiring passengers to certify to the baggage-master, or other agent, the value and character of the contents of their trunks, and may refuse to carry such property unless the certificate is made.[39] The duty of a passenger to declare the value of baggage, imposed by regulations of the interstate commerce commission which in terms refer to baggage delivered to the carrier and checked, refers only to baggage which the passenger has surrendered to the custody of the carrier and does not apply to hand baggage taken into a coach by the passenger and generally retained in his possession.[40]

In the absence of a special agreement, the carrier's common-law liability for baggage, of the nature of which it is ignorant, embraces only such articles as are baggage in a technical sense, as considered supra §§ 855–861, and if the passenger uses any means to deceive the carrier as to the character of his property offered as baggage, or to conceal its value, he cannot recover in case of a loss for more than the carrier was bound to carry as actual baggage,[41] unless the loss occurs through the carrier's gross negligence.[42] The fact of delivery of a trunk or other receptacle in which personal baggage is generally carried is an implied representation that it contains baggage only, and a failure to disclose the nature of the contents as being other than baggage may constitute such concealment as to relieve the carrier from liability so far as the contents are not baggage; and this rule applies in the case of a loss of baggage through the ordinary negligence of the carrier.[43] If, however, the carrier has knowledge that certain property tendered as baggage is not such, and accepts it as baggage, it may be liable for its loss as such, as shown above in § 861. In respect of interstate transportation of baggage, it has been held that that carrier may be held liable for merchandise transported as sample baggage even though the merchandise is not "sample baggage" within the meaning of a tariff schedule duly filed with the interstate commerce commission, where the passenger's statement, made at the time of checking, as to the character or nature of the merchandise leaves such character or nature indeterminate and there is no fraud on the part of the passenger.[44]

§ 880. Commencement of Liability; Delivery and Acceptance

The liability of a common carrier as such for baggage commences when the baggage is delivered to, and accepted by, the carrier.

The liability of a common carrier as such for the baggage of a passenger commences with the delivery of such baggage to, and the express or implied acceptance by, the carrier, and not before.[45] Where baggage is received by a carrier for immediate transportation, the liability as a common carrier attaches from the time of receiving the baggage, although for the convenience of the carrier, and the purpose of the presence of the porter was to facilitate the passenger's entry on the train; and the liability of the railroad company was that of common carrier and not of warehouseman.—Franklin v. Southern Pac. Co., 265 P. 936, 203 Cal. 630, 59 A.L.R. 118, certiorari denied Southern Pac. Co. v. Franklin, 49 S. Ct. 24, 278 U.S. 621, 73 L.Ed. 542.

Not warehouseman

Where a railroad company received a passenger's trunk from an expressman, but when the passenger subsequently went to the station to check the trunk, it could not be found, and the passenger accepted a check from the baggage-master on his promise that he would send the trunk on, and she presented the check at her destination, but failed to get the trunk, it appearing that it had been stolen from the company, the company's relation to the trunk was that of common carrier, and not of warehouseman.—Williams v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co., 88 N.Y.S. 434, 93 App.Div. 582, affirmed 76 N.E. 1116, 183 N.Y. 518.

Agent's agreement

Rev.St. art 713, requiring transportation of goods in the order received, imposes no duty to forward goods until actually received, and in the absence of proof of authority of an agent to bind a carrier by special contract to forward trunks not in the possession of the carrier, the carrier was bound by its legal duty to transport only after actual receipt of the trunks, and there can be no liability in the absence of a duty.—Schaff v. Hand baggage delivered to porter

Railroad company's liability in respect of hand baggage which was lost while in the possession of a red cap porter commenced when the baggage was delivered to such porter by the passenger with instructions to redeliver to the passenger on the train, where at the time of such delivery the passenger was in possession of tickets for interstate transportation, the train was about to de-

rier the passenger may consent to a delay of transportation.[46]

Purchasing ticket, obtaining check, and intention to become passenger A regulation that baggage will not be checked until a ticket has been procured is a reasonable one, as is also a rule requiring a ticket to be exhibited to the proper agent before such checking is done, as shown supra § 863. In general, however, where the baggage is delivered at the proper place and within a reasonable time, the carrier cannot limit or avoid liability by refusing to take charge of the baggage until the procurement of a ticket,[47] and, while the delivery must be with an intention to become a passenger,[48] it is not necessary that the passenger shall have bought his ticket if he in good faith intends to become a passenger;[49] nor in general is it necessary, in order to fix the carrier's liability, to show that the baggage has been checked, its liability commences from the time of actual delivery, properly made, without regard to whether or not a check has been issued.[50] It has been held, however, that, notwithstanding manual delivery to the carrier has been made, it is not liable as an insurer unless and until the relation of passenger and carrier arises.[51]

§ 881. What Constitutes Delivery to Carrier in General

In order to charge a common carrier with liability in respect of the care and transportation of baggage, there must be a delivery to, and acceptance by, an employee of the carrier who is authorized, or held out as authorized, to receive baggage.

In order that the delivery of baggage to a carrier may be such as to charge it with liability for its care and transportation, it must be delivered to, and accepted by, an employee who is authorized, or held out as authorized, to receive baggage; otherwise the carrier will not be liable.[52] The authority of a person acting as agent to bind the carrier by acceptance of baggage for transportation may be established by proof that such person has been allowed, in the ordinary course of business, thus to receive baggage and to bind the carrier with reference thereto.[53] Where delivery is made to the baggage-master it is sufficient, if made at the proper time and place, and an acceptance by him binds the carrier,[54] even where his acceptance is in violation of the regulations of his principal, if such regulations are unusual, and are not brought to the passenger's notice.[55] Delivery to an agent other than the baggage-master, having supervision and control over matters at the carrier's depot or station, is a delivery to the carrier, and is as binding as if the delivery had been to one whose special duty it was to receive baggage.[56] The carrier may be bound by delivery to a stranger, where such a delivery is caused by the improper directions of its agent to the passenger.[57]

Where the passenger's baggage is not accessible on his departure by the company's train, and he hands over to the baggage-master his check given him by another carrier, this amounts to a delivery to the company if it accepts the check and afterward undertakes to carry the baggage.[58] It has been held, however, that there is not a constructive delivery where a baggage check of one railroad company is delivered to the station agent of another company on the understanding that

Notwithstanding a check or receipt has been issued for a trunk by the carrier, the delivery of the trunk is not complete while it remains in the traveler's private dwelling.[60]

Notice to agent. The general rule is that where baggage is taken to a railroad station, and even to the place where baggage is usually received, some kind of notice must be given to some agent of the company authorized to accept the same in order to charge the carrier.[61] The carrier may, however, assent to the delivery of baggage at its station without notice to its agents, and this assent may be implied from its custom and course of business in allowing baggage to be deposited in its depots.[62]

§ 882. Time and Place of Delivery

In order to charge a carrier, as such, with liability in respect of baggage, delivery should not be made an unreasonably long time before the baggage is to be transported or the passenger is to depart, and should be made at the place provided for receiving baggage.

The delivery of baggage, to be binding on the carrier, must be made within a reasonable time before the time for it to be transported,[63] or before the intended departure of the passenger,[64] and the facilities offered for the receipt of baggage and the general custom of the place will furnish a basis for determining how long before the passenger intends actually to enter on his journey he may deliver his baggage to the carrier so as to render the carrier liable therefor.[65]

Where baggage is left with the carrier an unreasonable time before it is to be checked, in anticipation of a journey not about to be commenced, and to be called for and checked when the passenger is ready to begin his journey, the carrier is liable only as a warehouseman,[66] except in cases where the delay in shipment is the fault of the carrier.[67] A carrier has been regarded as a bailee for hire and not as a gratuitous bailee where it accepts a trunk several hours before the intended departure of the owner and the owner does not purchase a ticket and take passage because of the loss of the trunk while in the possession of the carrier at its station intermediate acceptance by it and the time when the owner arrives to take passage.[68] Notwithstanding a prospective passenger takes baggage to a station a considerable time before he intends to travel and the carrier is not charged with the duty of carrier, it may be under the duty to exercise reasonable care to protect the baggage from injury or destruction and may be liable for its own negligence in this regard.[69]

Place of delivery. Where a proper and suitable place for receiving baggage has been provided, delivery must be made at that place.[70] Where a trunk of an intending passenger is deposited at the usual and customary place for receiving baggage but the relation of passenger and carrier is not created, the carrier may be liable as warehouseman.[71]

§ 883. Continuance and Termination of Liability; Delivery

A carrier's liability as common carrier continues during transportation of, and for sufficient time thereafter to afford the carrier a reasonable opportunity to remove, the baggage.

A carrier's liability as common carrier or insurer for a passenger's baggage continues during transportation and for such a period thereafter as affords the passenger a reasonable opportunity to remove it,[72] and does not continue beyond such period,[73] and terminates as soon as the baggage has reached its destination and has been delivered to the owner[74] or his agent.[75]

It is the carrier's duty with regard to baggage which has reached its final destination to have it ready for delivery at the usual place of delivery with an employee in charge, until the passenger can in the exercise of due diligence call for and receive it,[76] and, where a delay in delivering the baggage to the passenger is due to the carrier's fault in not transporting it properly, or in otherwise not having it ready for delivery to him when called for, the liability of the carrier is thereby extended until the lapse of what is a reasonable time under the circumstances for the passenger to make another application for his baggage.[77] On the other hand, the carrier is entitled to a reasonable time within which to deliver the baggage, and what constitutes a reasonable time depends on the particular circumstances.[78] Where a statute so provides, a carrier is obligated to deliver every passenger's baggage, whether within the prescribed weight or not, immediately on the arrival of the passenger at his destination.[79]

Where it is the carrier's custom to allow baggage to be taken in charge by its employees to be delivered by them at a certain place and in a certain manner, it will be liable for the loss of baggage arising from the neglect of such employees to make the delivery according to custom.[80] There is not a delivery which will relieve the carrier of liability where the passenger, in order to protect his baggage after arrival at destination, removes it from a place of exposure where it has been left by the carrier's employees to a place at the station where it will be protected from the elements, even though the carrier or its employees do not have knowledge of such removal.[81]

Place of delivery. A delivery at a place other than that for which the contract of carriage calls is no delivery, and in such a case the carrier's liability continues until delivery at the proper point and notification to the passenger if the error has resulted in delay,[82] unless the passenger has waived his rights as to the place of delivery.[83] The facts that a passenger is allowed to stop over at an intermediate station and that the carrier, in disregard of the request of the passenger, checks and transports the passenger's baggage to the destination indicated by the ticket do not necessarily extend the liability of the carrier[84]

Surrender of check. A regulation requiring a passenger on receiving his baggage to surrender the check therefor is a reasonable one;[85] but a failure to tender such check will not relieve the carrier from liability where it makes an unqualified and continued refusal to deliver the baggage on demand.[86] rived at its destination. After a reasonable time for removal has elapsed, the carrier's liability thereafter is that of a warehouseman only.

After baggage has arrived at its destination, it is the passenger's duty, in the absence of some special circumstances excusing him from so doing, to call for and take it away within a reasonable time,[87] even though he has not been notified of its arrival.[88] In general, if the baggage remains in the carrier's possession after the passenger has had a reasonable opportunity to remove it, the carrier's liability in respect thereof as carrier or insurer ceases, and its liability is only that of warehouseman and, as such, it is bound to exercise only ordinary care in protecting the baggage, and is liable only for loss or injury caused by its negligence,[89] particularly where after such time the carrier stores the baggage as it is its duty to do, at the expense of the passenger, in accordance with the usual practice, as shown infra § 886.

Where baggage is left with the carrier an unreasonable time before it is to be transported, the carrier is liable only as warehouseman, as shown above in § 882.

A regulation of a state regulatory body allowing intra-state passengers forty-eight hours for the removal of baggage is not unreasonable.[90] Where a contract for the interstate transportation of baggage provides for the holding of baggage for the application of the passenger for a period of twenty-four hours after its arrival, the duty of the carrier as such does not terminate prior to the expiration of such period and liability is determinable under the Interstate Commerce Act and not under rules applying to warehousemen.[91]

Baggage received by mistake. It has been held that the carrier may be made liable as warehouseman where it receives the baggage of a passenger owing to the mistake of a connecting line, on the ground that, whether or not it has received it properly, it is incumbent on the carrier to take ordinary care of it.[92]

b. What Constitutes Reasonable Time

As to what constitutes a reasonable time for the removal of baggage by a passenger depends in general on the peculiar facts and circumstances of each case.

No absolute rule can be laid down as to what is a reasonable time within which a passenger must call for and remove his baggage. What is a reasonable time depends largely on the peculiar facts and circumstances of each case,[93] such as the character of the station, the facilities there for receiving baggage, and the opportunities afforded by the carrier for delivering baggage when called for.[94]

The omission of a passenger to call for his baggage until the day following that of arrival at his destination is, under ordinary circumstances, unreasonable, and therefor the carrier ceases to be responsible as such and is liable merely as a warehouseman.[95] However, under some circumstances

it is not unreasonable for a passenger arriving at his destination during the evening or late afternoon of one day to omit to call for his baggage until the morning of the following day.[96] Longer periods have been regarded as unreasonable, such as thirty hours,[97] a day and a half,[98] and from Friday night until Monday morning.[99] Failure of a passenger to call for his baggage within four hours after its arrival and before the closing of the station has been regarded as sufficient to relieve the carrier of liability as insurer.[1] On the other hand, it has been held that a failure to claim baggage until thirty-six hours after its arrival does not change the carrier's liability for its loss to that of a warehouseman without a showing that the loss was due to the delay.[2]

The reasonable time begins to run from the arrival of the baggage, and not of the passenger.[3] There is authority for the view that a passenger is not required to make a demand for his baggage immediately on arriving at his destination,[4] but the view has been expressed that, where it is the usual course of business to make delivery immediately on the arrival of the baggage, the rule as to reasonable time does not in general extend the time for delivery and acceptance beyond the time of arrival, as affecting the carrier's liability as such.[5]

The time is not ordinarily extended by an unusual circumstance for which the carrier is in no way responsible.[6]

§ 885. Baggage Remaining for Passenger's Accommodation

Where the carrier is in possession of baggage not for the purpose of transportation but merely for the convenience of the owner or passenger, the carrier is not liable as a common carrier in respect of such baggage, but is liable as warehouseman or bailee.

Where the passenger on arrival at his destination takes his baggage into his own exclusive possession and control, the carrier's liability as common carrier ends, and does not attach again by reason of the fact that the baggage agent, for the accommodation and convenience of the passenger, agrees to store it until sent for.[7] It has been held or recognized that, where the retention of possession by the carrier is at the request of the passenger, the status of the carrier is that of warehouseman, and that the carrier is under the duty to use ordinary care, at least where there is an agreement to pay storage charges.[8] According to some cases, however, if no storage charges are paid, the carrier is merely a gratuitous bailee, liable only

Storage of baggage

(1) Where trunk on arrival at station was left there under an agreement with terminal company that storage would be paid therefor, the liability of the terminal company was that of a warehouseman, as a bailee for hire, and not that of a common carrier.—Bowles v. Payne, 251 S.W. 101.

(2) The right of a terminal station company to charge storage on baggage left with it after the first twenty-four hours gives it a contingent benefit sufficient to charge it with liability for such baggage as upon a lucrative bailment, so that it would be liable for negligently failing to deliver the baggage, even though the terminal company had held the baggage for less than twenty-four hours.—Birmingham Terminal Co. v Thomas, 92 So. 803, 207 Ala. 363

(3) In determining whether or not the bailment was one for hire, it was held that a traveling salesman's sample case containing patterns and designs used in the business of soliciting orders, carried by him in the passenger coach, was baggage, within a notice of the carrier for the storage of baggage, and fixing charges for storage on each piece of baggage after remaining at the station for a specified time.—Milwaukee Mirror, etc., Works v. Chicago, etc, R Co, 134 N.W. 379, 148 Wis. 173, 38 L.R.A.,N.S., 383.

Where a carrier maintains two places in its depot for the storage of baggage at slightly different rates, a passenger has the option to select either place, in the absence of any objection by the carrier that the right place is not selected when he tenders the baggage for storage; and the carrier, by accepting it for storage in one place, is estopped from asserting that it should have been taken to the other place.—Milwaukee Mirror, etc., Works v Chicago, etc, R. Co, 134 N.W. 379, 148 Wis. 173, 38 L.R.A.,N.S., 383.

for gross negligence.[9]

In respect of baggage checked in a parcel room of a carrier by a passenger, for which a charge is made, the carrier acts in the capacity of warehouseman and assumes the obligation of a bailee for hire, involving the necessity of exercising ordinary care.[10]

§ 886. Duty to Store and Protect Baggage

A carrier, in its capacity as warehouseman, is under a duty properly to store baggage and to protect baggage so stored, and is liable for its negligent failure to comply with such duty.

It is the carrier's duty as warehouseman to store the baggage in a proper and suitable place and to exercise ordinary care and diligence in safely keeping it there and in protecting it, and it is liable for the loss resulting from negligence in the performance of this duty, such duty arising not under an independent contract, but as a part of the carrier's duty under the original contract of transportation.[11] There is authority for the view that it is a condition precedent to the change of the carrier's responsibility from that of a common carrier to that of a warehouseman that the baggage shall have been stored in a reasonably safe and secure warehouse and that, until this has been done, the carrier's liability remains that of common carrier.[12] Whether a carrier's duty as warehouseman requires the employment of a watchman, or the construction of fireproof depots, or the adoption of other precautions, must depend on the circumstances and the location of the depot.[13]

Where the carrier is in the relation of warehouseman, it is not responsible for the neglect of its employees to rescue baggage in the warehouse from destruction by fire when such employees are there, but not in the course of their employment,[14] although the rule is otherwise when they are present in the course of their employment.[15]

According to some cases, the duty to store and protect baggage extends only to articles which come within the definition of baggage, and does not include articles improperly checked as baggage.[16]

Some statutes imposing liability on railroad companies for destruction of property by fire do not apply to the loss of a passenger's baggage by a fire which was not caused by, or did not result from, the operation of a train.[17]

§ 887. Connecting Carriers and Through Tickets

While the relations between carriers over whose lines baggage is to be transported as a through shipment may be of such a character as to render them jointly and severally liable for a loss wherever it occurs, as a general rule, subject to certain qualifications as to the initial carrier, a carrier is not liable for a loss which does not occur on its line in the absence of a special contract, where the connecting lines are distinct and independent.

Where there are several connecting lines forming a united continuous line, all parts of one system under the same general direction and control, each is responsible for a loss; since the whole constitutes but one line, and each is the quasi partner of the others, they are jointly and severally liable for a loss wherever occurring.[18] Where, however, the connecting lines are distinct and independent, in the absence of a special contract no carrier can be rendered liable for a loss unless it is shown to have occurred on its lines,[19] except in those jurisdictions where the initial carrier is held to assume liability for the entire route, as shown infra § 888. The mere fact that several lines have an agreement by which tickets are to be sold by any one over the lines of the others, and baggage is to be checked accordingly, does not make them partners, or liable as such.[20]

In determining questions as to liability, the surrounding circumstances and the relations between the various carriers, as well as the provisions of the ticket, may be material considerations.[21]

Line of which several carriers own distinct parts. Where a carrier operates its cars over a line, distinct parts of which are owned by different companies, and such carrier's agent receives into its baggage car baggage of a passenger who has a ticket for a through passage over the entire line, such carrier may be liable for loss of baggage regardless of the particular point on the line at which the loss occurs.[22]

Interstate transportation. In view of the Carmack Amendment, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11), under the practice in some jurisdictions a joint recovery for loss of baggage may be had against the initial carrier and a succeeding carrier which actually causes the loss.[23]

§ 888. Liability of Initial Carrier

a. In general
b. Limitation of liability

a. In General

In general the initial carrier is liable for a loss of baggage which occurs on its own line, and it may by contract assume liability for loss or injury which occurs in the course of through transportation beyond its line.

In general the initial carrier is liable for a loss of baggage which occurs on its own line.[24] Even when the initial carrier is liable only for losses occurring on its own line, a delivery by it to the succeeding carrier is necessary in order to enable the initial carrier to avoid liability, and, in order to be effective in this regard, the delivery must consist of such unequivocal acts of transfer of possession to the succeeding line as will permit the passenger to charge the latter line with the care and custody of the baggage.[25]

The initial carrier may by contract bind itself for the entire transportation to a destination beyond its own line, and thus render itself liable for loss of, or damage to, the baggage, whether on its own line or on the line of a connecting carrier which acts as its agent in carrying out the contract of transportation;[26] and it has been held that such a contract may be implied from the circumstances or from the usage of the initial carrier.[27]

According to what is known as the English doctrine, which is followed in a number of jurisdictions in this country, a carrier selling a through ticket and checking a passenger's baggage through to a point beyond its lines undertakes, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary, to insure the safe delivery of such baggage at the point to which the ticket is sold, and is therefore liable for loss of or injury to such baggage wherever occurring, the connecting carriers being regarded only as its agents in transporting the baggage;[28] and it has been held that this rule applies although the ticket contains a provision to the contrary, if the passenger had no notice thereof and did not assent thereto, as shown in the following subdivision of this section. It has also been held that the initial carrier's liability is not affected by the fact that the passenger is traveling on a through ticket, having a separate coupon for each line,[29] nor by the fact

Notwithstanding rule of corporation commission

An initial carrier was not relieved of liability for actual value of passenger's baggage lost after delivery to connecting carrier, because of corporation commission rule restricting liability of carrier, since commission has no power to change statutory rule fixing liability of initial carrier—Southwestern Transp Co. v. Poye, 110 S W.2d 494, 194 Ark. 982.

Round-trip ticket

The applicability of the rule has apparently been recognized where the initial carrier sold a round-trip ticket and the loss occurred on the return trip.—Bush v Beauchamp, 201 S W 828, 132 Ark. 582.

Statutes making initial carrier liable for loss of or injury to property through its negligence or negligence of connecting carrier, giving initial carrier recourse on carrier causing loss, requiring carrier to carry baggage of passengers, and making carrier liable for actual damages on failure to deliver baggage in good condition with due diligence, reenact common-law rule relative to initial and connecting carriers.—Southwestern Transp Co v. Poye, 110 S W.2d 494, 194 Ark 982

(2) In other cases the view has been taken that, in the absence of a special contract or of a community of interest between the lines involved, the initial carrier is not liable for a loss which does not occur on its line—Milnor v. New York, etc., R. Co., 53 N.Y. 363, affirming 4 Daly 355—10 C J. p 1223 note 26, p 1224 note 31.

that other carriers sell the passenger a return ticket at reduced rates in consideration of his releasing them from liability for the loss where such carriers are not liable in any event.[30] In other jurisdictions, however, in the absence of any partnership arrangement or contract for through transportation, the rule is that the initial carrier engages only to transport the baggage to the end of its line and there to deliver it to the connecting line, and therefore is liable only for such losses as occur on its own line or through its failure to make proper delivery of the baggage to the connecting line;[31] and it should not be held to assume liability throughout unless its intention so to do is clearly apparent;[32] and this rule has been in effect prescribed by some statutes.[33]

Interstate transportation. In view of the Carmack amendment, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11), a carrier receiving baggage for interstate transportation over a connecting line is liable for a loss occurring on the line of a connecting or succeeding carrier;[34] but, as shown in the following subdivision of this section, the initial carrier may limit its liability to loss or injury occurring on its own line.

Neglect of initial carrier in checking. Independently of any special contract, the initial carrier is liable for any loss, whether occurring on its own or subsequent lines, due to its own negligence in failing properly to check or forward the baggage.[35]

b. Limitation of Liability

The initial carrier may, by contract, provide against its liability for loss of, or injury to, baggage which occurs beyond its lines.

In the absence of any governing statute or regulation providing otherwise, a carrier may, by contract, limit its liability to injuries to, or loss of, baggage occurring on its own lines,[36] and, in some jurisdictions at least, no special consideration is necessary in order to render such limitation valid.[37] Where the rule that the initial carrier is not liable for losses occurring beyond the terminus of its own line in the absence of the assumption of such liability by express contract or of the existence of an arrangement in the nature of a partnership exists between the lines involved is recognized, the fact that the passenger does not have knowledge of a condition printed on a through ticket providing that the initial carrier acts only as the agent of the connecting lines in selling the ticket and will not be responsible beyond its own line does not of itself render the initial carrier liable for a loss occurring beyond its own line.[38] In jurisdictions in which the rule that the initial carrier selling a through

Transportation pursuant to request of United States government

An initial carrier which accepts a request from the United States government for the transportation of an enlisted man and issues a ticket thereon is bound by the provisions of the request, and the person carried cannot vary the request or bind the government to a limited responsibility indicated on the back of the ticket delivered to such person, and the initial carrier is liable for the loss of a kit bag of the enlisted man which occurred beyond its lines—Atlantic Coast Line R. Consideration necessary

(1) A carrier may not limit its statutory liability for loss or damage to baggage or as an initial carrier, even by express contract, unless supported by consideration, such as reduction in fare.—Southwestern Transp. Co. v. Poye, 110 S.W.2d 494, 194 Ark. 982.

(2) Accordingly, where carrier offers one fare without limitation as to liability for loss of baggage and reduced fare with such a limitation, carrier, to enforce limitation, must show that it gave passenger option to accept either fare, and that passenger accepted contract containing limitation—Southwestern Transp. Co. v. Poye, supra.

Provision effecting limitation

(1) Provision of bus ticket that selling carrier acted only as agent in selling ticket and checking or carrying baggage thereon, and was not responsible for loss, damage, or injury beyond its own lines, constituted an effective limitation—Dixie Greyhound Lines v. Kaplan, 89 S.W. 2d 342, 169 Tenn. 513.

(2) In an earlier case, however, the view was taken that a stipulation that in selling the ticket the carrier acts as agent and is not responsible beyond its own line refers only to personal injuries and does not relieve the initial carrier of liability for loss of baggage beyond its line.—Coward v East Tennessee, etc, R. Co., 16 Lea, Tenn., 225, 57 Am.R. 226.

37. Tenn—Dixie Greyhound Lines v. Kaplan, 89 S.W.2d 342, 169 Tenn. 513.

Reason for rule

The view has been expressed that "it was not necessary to the validity of this restriction of responsibility that it rest on any consideration, because a carrier is not required to transport goods beyond the terminus of its lines."—Dixie Greyhound Lines v. Kaplan, 89 S.W.2d 342, 343, 169 Tenn. 513.

ticket and checking baggage through to the passenger's destination is liable for losses occurring on any of the connecting lines is recognized, however, the view has been taken that a condition printed on the ticket limiting such carrier's liability to its own lines is not binding on the passenger unless it is brought to his knowledge.[39]

Interstate transportation. In respect of interstate transportation of baggage, the initial carrier may, by valid stipulation, limit its liability to a loss occurring on its own line, and a provision to that effect contained in a ticket issued by the initial carrier and in a tariff filed by such carrier with the interstate commerce commission is binding on the passenger and is effective, notwithstanding the ticket is not signed by the passenger and his attention is not called to the provision therein for limitation other than by delivery of the ticket to him.[40]

§ 889. Liability of Succeeding Carriers

In general each carrier engaged in through transportation of baggage is liable for a loss which occurs on its line.

Each carrier is liable for a loss shown to have occurred on its own line, or where it fails to account for baggage proved to have been delivered to it in good order by a preceding carrier,[41] and the fact that the initial carrier may also be liable does not affect the rule.[42]

The initial carrier has no power, in the absence of a special contract, to bind a connecting line so as to make it liable for injuries not occurring on the line of the latter,[43] and the fact that an initial carrier has sold a through ticket does not of itself render a subsequent carrier liable for loss or injury which does not occur on the line of the subsequent carrier.[44] In order that a connecting carrier may be held liable it must be shown that the baggage was delivered to it.[45]

Where a connecting carrier accepts a trunk for transportation pursuant to a through contract for the transportation of the passenger and his baggage, and the trunk is lost while in such connecting carrier's control, the fact that the baggage was not carried on the same train with the passenger, and without his knowledge or default was diverted in transit by an intermediate carrier, and failed to follow the route called for by the passenger's ticket is immaterial.[46]

Liability of last carrier. While there is authority for the view that a passenger who purchases a through ticket over a line of railroads, which has a coupon attached for each road, and who checks his baggage through to his destination may charge the last carrier with loss of the baggage whether or not it actually received the baggage,[47] as a gen-

In New York

(1) It has been held that the liability of a carrier selling a ticket to a passenger to a point beyond its own line for loss of baggage delivered to a connecting line in good order is not limited by conditions in fine print on a ticket, providing that in checking baggage beyond its own line the carrier restricts its liability to wearing apparel of a specified value, where there is no evidence that the passenger knew of such conditions and agreed to them—Hutchins v Pennsylvania R. Co, 73 N.E. 972, 181 N Y. 186, 106 Am S R. 537, affirming 86 N.Y S. 1138, 92 App Div. 612.

(2) There have been decisions, however, to the effect that the fact that the passenger did not have knowledge of, nor assent to, a limitation in his ticket that the initial carrier assumed no responsibility beyond its own line did not prevent its avoidance of liability for a loss occurring beyond its line.—Marmorstein v Pennsylvania R. Earlier case followed eral rule, in the absence of special statutes, the liability of the last carrier is similar to that of any intermediate carrier and it is liable only on proof of the receipt of the baggage by it, and of its failure to deliver in the same condition in which it received it.[48] In the absence of proof that the initial carrier was the agent of the last, or that there was a contract or arrangement, either express or implied, or a custom from which such contract or arrangement could be inferred as to the transportation of a passenger's baggage, the last carrier is not liable for injuries occurring to baggage on the initial or intermediate carrier's line.[49] Even where the rule imposing liability on the last carrier if the passenger purchases a through ticket is recognized, a carrier from whom a passenger purchases a ticket for transportation over the line of such carrier to final destination is not liable for the loss of baggage unless such carrier received the baggage, notwithstanding the first carrier which was not the agent of the last carrier checked the baggage to a point on the last carrier's line.[50]

The agreement of the baggage-master of the last carrier at a union station to forward baggage over the line of another carrier which uses such station has been construed to refer to forwarding the baggage when received at such station, and not to constitute an agreement to have the baggage sent to the union station from another station of the last carrier, at which it had properly been delivered, in order to forward over the other line, where the baggage-master has no knowledge that the baggage has been delivered at such other station.[51] It has been held that the baggage-master at the union station has no authority in such case to make an agreement to have the baggage forwarded from such other station of the last carrier.[52]

Interstate transportation. In the case of the interstate transportation of baggage, a succeeding carrier who causes the loss may be held liable.[53]

Limitation of liability. It has been held that a connecting carrier is entitled to the benefit of a provision for limitation of liability contained in a through ticket on which the baggage is checked,[54] even where the limitation is, in terms, in favor of the initial carrier.[55]

§ 890. Presumptions as to Where Injury or Loss Occurred

In case of failure to deliver baggage to the passenger at destination or of total loss, a presumption against the initial carrier arises. Failure to deliver to the passenger at destination or delivery in bad condition raises a presumption that the last carrier is responsible for the loss or injury.

It has been held or recognized that, in case of nondelivery at destination, or of total loss, a presumption of the liability of the initial carrier which received the baggage from the passenger arises,[56] and that accordingly, where the liability of the initial carrier is confined to its own line and delivery to a connecting carrier, the initial carrier must prove that the baggage was actually delivered to the connecting carrier in order that the initial carrier may avoid liability for nondelivery at destination or total loss, as shown infra § 897. While the view has been taken that, in case of a total loss of baggage, as distinguished from mere damage to it, a presumption of negligence arises against the initial carrier,[57] it has been held that failure of the last carrier to deliver baggage is not evidence of negligence on the part of the initial carrier.[58] In case of delivery in bad order by the last carrier, a presumption does not arise against the initial carrier.[59]

But the view has been taken that a connecting carrier is not entitled to the benefit of a provision for limitation in a through ticket which, in terms, is for the benefit of the initial carrier.—Hasbrouck v New York Cent. etc. R Co, 118 N.Y.S. 735, 64 Misc. 478, affirmed on other grounds 122 N.Y.S 123, 137 App Div. 532, affirmed 95 N.E. 808, 202 N.Y. 363, 35 L.R.A.,N.S., 537, Ann.Cas. 1912D 1150.

Reason for rule

A connecting carrier, in receiving baggage from the initial carrier for further transportation, is the agent of the initial carrier and as such agent is entitled to claim the benefit of any part of the original contract of shipment.—Aiken v. Wabash R Co., 80 Mo.App. 8.

56. Ala.—Montgomery, etc., R Co. v. Culver, 75 Ala. 587, 51 Am.R. 483.

59. Ala.—Montgomery, etc., R. Co. v Culver, 75 Ala. 587, 51 Am.R 483.

As affecting the liability of the last carrier there is authority for the view that the delivery of baggage in good order and condition to the initial carrier raises a presumption that the baggage continued in that order and condition while in the possession of the initial carrier and remained in that order and condition at the time of delivery to the last carrier,[60] and a presumption prevails that a failure to deliver at the end of the transportation,[61] or delivery in bad condition,[62] is through the fault of the last carrier, until it has exonerated itself by showing that it did not receive the baggage or received it in the condition in which it reaches its destination, as shown infra § 897.

According to some cases, the fact that the baggage was injured or partly destroyed on reaching its destination does not create a presumption against any intermediate carrier[63] and does not cast on such carrier the burden of proving that it delivered the baggage in good condition to the next connecting carrier, as shown infra § 897; and a like rule applies as to want of a presumption against an intermediate carrier in respect of the loss of, and failure to deliver, the baggage.[64] There is authority for the view, however, that, where the initial carrier shows a delivery of the baggage to the next connecting carrier which is an intermediate carrier, in the condition in which it was received from the passenger, the presumption against the initial carrier in respect of a loss of baggage is rebutted and transferred to such connecting carrier,[65] and that the burden of rebutting such presumption is cast on such connecting carrier, as shown infra § 897.

Interstate transportation. The provisions of the Carmack Amendment, which imposes liability on the initial carrier for loss of baggage occurring on the line of a succeeding carrier, as shown supra § 888, have not abrogated nor changed the usual presumption that baggage shown to have been delivered in good condition to the initial carrier remained in that condition at the time of delivery to the last carrier, and that the loss or injury occurred while in the possession of the last carrier,[66] and the last carrier may not avoid liability for a loss unless it rebuts such presumption, as shown infra § 897. In respect of an intermediate carrier, however, there is no presumption that the loss occurred on its line[67]

§ 891. Transfer Companies

In general, a transfer company engaged in the business of transferring baggage to and from the stations of passenger carriers is liable in respect of baggage as a common carrier or insurer. A transfer company may generally limit its liability by special contract

While it has been broadly stated that the service rendered to the public who employ a local transfer company is accessorial in its nature and one which the law does not require a common carrier to perform,[68] in view of the rule generally recognized that transfer companies engaged in the business of transferring baggage to and from the stations of carriers of passengers are regarded as common carriers, as shown supra § 9, in general, such a company incurs the responsibility of a common carrier, or of insurer against all losses or damage except such as are caused by an act of God or the public enemy,[69] and is liable for injury to, or loss of, baggage as a carrier of baggage,[70] but is re-

Negligence

In an action against carriers for loss of baggage transported between states, proof of delivery to the initial carrier and nondelivery by the last carrier makes out a prima facie case of negligence against the last carrier.—Dietz v. Southern Pac. Ry Co, 28 S.W.2d 395, 225 Mo.App 39.

Articles taken from trunk

Delivery of trunk and contents in good condition to initial carrier raised presumption that trunk and contents continued in that condition while in possession of that carrier, and were so delivered by it to connecting and last carrier, and in absence of rebuttal proof owner was entitled to recover damages from connecting and last carrier for wearing apparel removed from trunk.—Maillard v. In New York

(1) Public Service Commissions Law § 38, as originally enacted, providing that a common carrier of passengers is liable for the full value of property carried as baggage and permitting the carrier to make a rea-

leased from liability after it has made a proper delivery of the baggage.[71] Where the negligence of the transfer company concurs with an act of God and becomes a part of the direct and proximate cause of an injury to baggage, the company is liable.[72]

A contract with a transfer company by which such company undertakes to carry baggage from the railroad station and to deliver it at the passenger's residence, made after the completion of the passenger's journey by rail, is a new contract which is independent of the contract with the railroad company for the transportation of the baggage, as affecting the liability of the transfer company in respect of the baggage.[73]

In some jurisdictions, in determining the liability of a transfer company as a common carrier of goods or of baggage only, the term "baggage" is not given the same restricted meaning that is given to the term "baggage," under the rules, stated above in §§ 855-861, which apply in the case of transportation of baggage as an incident to the transportation of the owner as a passenger,[74] and, therefore, the liability of the transfer company is not necessarily determined by the nature of the articles carried.[75] It has been held that the traveler is not under a duty to inform the transfer company of the nature of the articles offered for transportation, in the absence of an inquiry by the company in that regard, and that the traveler's silence is not of itself a fraud or imposition on the company.[76] There is authority for the view, however, that, where a baggage check for a trunk is delivered to a transfer company in exchange for the latter's check, without disclosure that the trunk contains property other than ordinary baggage, the transaction amounts to a representation that the trunk contains only ordinary baggage, and is a fraud on the transfer company which will relieve it of liability for loss in an action on contract, where the trunk actually contains merchandise of large value.[77]

Where a passenger gives his baggage check to a transfer company at his destination for the further carriage of the baggage to his residence, the presumption is that the transfer company received the baggage from the railroad company in good condition,[78] and, where the baggage was delivered by the railroad company to the transfer company, there is a presumption that the loss occurred while in the hands of the transfer company as the last carrier.[79]

Limitation of liability. While some statutory provisions that it shall not be lawful for a common carrier to limit its common-law liability safely to deliver property by any stipulation or limitation expressed in the receipt given for such property apply to transfer companies,[80] and it has been held sonable charge for assumption of liability for a declared value in excess of a specified amount, did not apply where a transfer company merely undertook to carry a trunk without undertaking to transport the owner and, incidentally, his trunk.—Morgan v Woolverton, 96 N.E 354, 203 N.Y 52, 36 L.R.A.,N.S., 640, affirming 120 N.Y.S. 1008, 136 App.Div. 351—10 C.J. p 1208 note 97 [d] (2).

(2) Prior to the foregoing decision by the court of appeals, it was held that § 38 applied to a transfer company, notwithstanding it did not carry passengers.—Meister v. Woolverton, 125 N.Y.S. 439, 140 App Div. 926, affirming 121 N.Y.S. 606, 67 Misc. 167—10 C.J. p 1208 note 97 [d] (1).

(3) Since the above decision by the court of appeals, § 38 has been amended by adding the words "baggage company, transfer company" after "common carrier," and the words "whether in connection with the transportation of the owner or not" after the words "carried as baggage."

Transfer company unloading baggage from car

The mere fact that the employees of the baggage express company unloaded the baggage from the baggage car and placed it in the baggage room of the carrier will not render the baggage company subsequently receiving checks for delivery to the passenger's residence liable for a portion of the baggage found to be missing when the checks are presented by the baggage company to the railroad company.—Aikin v. Westcott, 25 N.E. 503, 123 N.Y 363.

Want of assent by traveler

In view of the statutory provision, Cahill St. c 27 § 1, that a common carrier may not limit its common-law liability to deliver property safely, a traveler was not bound by provisions on the back of a check, received from a transfer company on delivery of a trunk and contents to the latter, that the check is given as a receipt on the representation, express or implied, and the understanding that said article of baggage does not exceed a specified amount in value and contains no other property than such personal effects known as

that a transfer company cannot limit its liability for the negligence of itself or of its servants,[81] a transfer company may in general by special contract limit its liability for the loss of, or injury to, baggage carried by it.[82]

A distinction has been made, in the matter of the effect of acceptance of receipts as affecting limitation of liability, between freight and baggage cases, as shown above in § 91, and, while there is authority for the view that a traveler is bound by a notice of limitation in a receipt issued by a transfer company, even though he did not read such notice,[83] in general where a person, on delivery of baggage to a local express or transfer company, receives a paper or check, which, from the circumstances of the transaction, he has a right to regard simply as a receipt or voucher, to enable him to forward and identify his property, and no notice is given to show that it embodies a special contract and is intended to serve some other purpose than as a voucher, no contract arises as a matter of law from the acceptance of the receipt,[84] and the passenger or traveler will not be bound by such a condition on the receipt, card, or check given to him unless he has knowledge of, and assents to, the condition,[85] or, as sometimes stated, unless notice of the limitation is brought to the attention of the traveler under circumstances from which his assent thereto may be implied,[86] omission of the shipper to read the paper is not per se negligence.[87] By virtue of some statutes, however, a traveler may be bound by a limitation contained in a receipt issued to him by a transfer company, even though he neither reads nor has actual knowledge of its terms.[88] A notice of limitation contained in a receipt issued by a transfer company is strictly construed against it.[89]

Some statutes, providing for a statement of the value of the baggage and authorizing the carrier to make a reasonable charge for the assumption of liability in excess of an amount in value specified in the statute, permit a transfer company to limit its liability by inserting a provision therefor in schedules of rates and charges where it files such schedules with a public regulatory body, and posts notice thereof, in accordance with other statutory provisions,[90] and a schedule duly filed constitutes of itself notice of the limitation to the traveler and ordinary railroad baggage, and that the liability of the company for property other than such baggage shall be limited to that of involuntary bailee, at least in the absence of a showing that such provisions were brought to the attention of the passenger and that he assented to them —Stanfield v Frank Parmelee Co, 223 Ill.App 199

Trunk stolen by transfer company's employee

In a case in which a trunk delivered to a transfer company was stolen by the driver of such company's conveyance, it was held that, under the facts disclosed by the record, the liability of the company was not limited to the amount of maximum liability stated in a provision for limitation on the back of a check given to the traveler's sister on delivery of the trunk to the transfer company.—Fessler v. Rule as to interstate transportation not applicable

Provisions, and amendment, of statute

(1) The rule stated in the text has been applied, under the provision of the Public Service Commissions Law § 38 that every common carrier, baggage company, transfer company, and railroad corporation shall be liable in respect of property carried as baggage, whether or not in connection with the transportation of the owner, up to the full value and regardless of its character, and that the value in excess of one hundred and fifty dollars shall be stated and the carrier may make a reasonable charge for the assumption of such liability in excess of said amount.—Levett v Draper, 185 N.Y.S 891, 194 App Div. 632

(2) Prior to the amendment of such provision of § 38 by adding the words "baggage company, transfer company" after "common carrier," and "whether in connection with the transportation of the owner or not" after "carried as baggage," such provision could not be the basis of a claim of limitation of liability by a transfer company which undertook to transport a trunk without transporting the owner.—Morgan v. Wool-

the limitation is effective, even though the traveler does not have actual knowledge of the limitation.[91] The mere failure of a local agent of the transfer company to inquire as to the value of the baggage is not a waiver of the limitation so established under the statutory provisions,[92] nor does the transfer company lose the right, on the ground of waiver or estoppel, to claim the benefit of the limitation merely because the receipt for baggage issued by it attempts to limit its liability to an amount less than that specified in the statute and in the schedules.[93]

§ 892. Actions for Delay, Loss or Injury

A provision of a tariff filed with the interstate commerce commission which fixes the time of delivery of the baggage instead of the time of giving notice of rejection by the carrier of the passenger's claim for loss as the time from which the period within which action must be brought shall run, contravenes the federal statutes regulating commerce and is ineffective, where the passenger's rights are governed by such statutes.

Where the rights of a passenger in respect of the loss of baggage are governed by provisions of the federal statutes for the regulation of commerce, a provision of a tariff filed with the interstate commerce commission as to the time within which action must be brought, which is based on the time of the delivery of the baggage rather than on the time of the giving of written notice by the carrier disallowing the passenger's claim, is violative of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended by Act of Febr. 28, 1920, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11), and is void.[94]

§ 893. Nature and Form

In general, trover will lie where baggage is wrongfully detained or is lost by delivery to the wrong person.

The question as to whether the remedy of a passenger for loss of or injury to baggage is by an action on contract or in tort has been considered under varying circumstances, and is treated in the title Actions § 49 e (5).

Trover may be maintained against a carrier for baggage which is wrongfully detained,[95] or where the goods intrusted to it are lost by its act, although without any wrongful intent, as where the carrier delivers the baggage to the wrong person by mistake or under a forged order,[96] or where the carrier ships the property as freight in defiance of the owner's right to have it carried as baggage or not at all.[97] Where, however, the baggage is lost through a mere omission of the carrier, as where it has been stolen or lost through its negligence, trover will not lie even after a demand and refusal, as in such case the owner should bring either assumpsit or a special action on the case.[98]

Assumpsit is not maintainable if the baggage is being carried free.[99]

Sufficiency of posting of notice

Where a transfer company had posted notice as to where its schedules are on file and available for inspection, in two offices on the main floor of the railroad station where its business was transacted, it can rely on a limitation of liability in such schedules, under Public Service Commissions Law § 28 requiring two notices to be exhibited in the office where the regular business was transacted, even though the transfer company also had a movable desk on the mezzanine floor of the station, to which passengers first came in leaving the trains, at which no notice was posted, such desk not being an "office" within the meaning of the statute.—Levett v. Draper, 185 N.Y. S. 891, 194 App.Div. 632.

91. N.Y.—Levett v. Draper, supra.

92. N.Y.—Levett v. Draper, supra.
10 C J. p 1209 note 3 [a].

But in earlier cases in which Public Service Commissions Law § 38 was under consideration, the view was expressed that the transfer company waived the benefit of the statute by a failure to inquire as to value and to make an excess charge—Meister v. Woolverton, 135 N.Y S 439, 140 App.Div. 926, affirming 121 N Y.S. 606 67 Misc. 167—Noel v Westcott Express Co, 158 N.Y.S. 702, 95 Misc 154

Reason for present rule

The fact of waiver always rests on intention voluntarily to relinquish a right, and the failure of a local agent to make inquiry as to excess value does not show any intention on the part of the transfer company voluntarily to relinquish any right, a local agent has no power, nor any presumed authority, to waive any such limitation when once that limitation is imposed by the act of the company in the filing of the schedules creating the limitation.—Levett v. Draper, 185 N Y S 891, 194 App. Div. 632.

Duty of traveler to inquire as to limitation

An owner of a trunk, who admitted she had a general knowledge that transfer companies limited their liability for loss of trunks intrusted to them, is put on inquiry to ascertain the particular limitation of liability before delivering the trunk to such company, and cannot rely on the omission of the company to inquire the value of the trunk as a waiver of its limitation of liability.—Levett v. Draper, 185 N.Y.S. 891, 194 App Div. 632.

Transfer company

An action for conversion against a transfer company has been sustained where it failed to make the transfer of baggage received by it for transfer, to deliver the same on demand, and to explain the manner of the loss or to show the exercise of due care to avoid the loss—Stine v. Hines, 181 N.W. 321, 148 Minn 132.

99. Mich.—Flint, etc., R Co. v. Weir, 37 Mich. 111, 26 Am.R. 499.

On failure of a transfer company, which, at the request of the owner of a trunk, has received from a railroad carrier, and accepted for storage in its own warehouse, such trunk, to deliver the trunk to the owner, the owner may elect to maintain either an action in the nature of assumpsit for breach of contract, an action in case for negligence, or, if there has been a conversion, an action in trover for conversion.[1]

§ 894. Right of Action and Persons Entitled to Sue

A passenger who checks, or is in possession of, baggage in connection with his transportation by the carrier may, under certain circumstances, maintain an action for loss or injury. The right of the owner to sue, notwithstanding he was not the passenger, has been recognized.

The person who checks, or has the right to possession of, baggage in connection with his transportation as passenger may bring an action for loss or injury, although he is not the real owner thereof.[2] The real owner may bring an action for the loss of, or injury to, his property, although he is not the person who as passenger checked the baggage for transportation,[3] but it has been held that he cannot maintain an action on the contract therefor,[4] and that a carrier is not liable, as carrier, to the owner of property carried as baggage where the relation of passenger and carrier does not exist between the owner and the carrier, unless at the time of the receipt of such property as baggage the carrier is informed that it does not belong to the passenger who carries it.[5] Where, however, the contract of carriage is made by an agent, or for the benefit, of the owner, the owner may maintain an action on the contract.[6]

Where sample cases are checked by a traveling salesman, his principal, to whom the goods belonged, may maintain an action for their loss,[7] even though the principal was undisclosed and the baggage was checked as the property of the agent.[8] It has been held, however, that, as a contract of transportation is personal, the principal cannot sue thereon for loss of, or injury to, the baggage even under an assignment of the claim by the salesman.[9] It has also been held that, where a member of a partnership takes personal property of the firm with him as baggage, the firm has no right of action against the carrier for injury thereto.[10]

Where baggage is wrongfully detained, the owner may assign his title thereto, and the assignee, after another demand therefor, may maintain an action in the nature of an action of trover.[11]

The holder of a single check for a trunk containing the baggage of the members of his family, who is the person with whom the contract of transportation was made, may sue for the entire loss, in view of the fact that the carrier would be protected by a judgment of such holder against claims of other members of the family.[12]

Where one of two coöwners of dogs, taken on a hunting expedition, purchased the tickets for the entire party, and, in making the contract for the transportation of the dogs, acted for himself and for his coowner, the carrier was liable on the contract to both owners for loss of the dogs. The fact that one of the owners of the dogs was not present when the tickets were purchased by his coöwner did not defeat the right of both owners to sue for the carrier's breach of duty growing out of the contract for the transportation of the dogs, which was a contract either between the carrier and the coowners or for their sole benefit—Louisville & N. Husband and wife. A husband may sue for the loss of baggage, although it is not transported on the train with him, but on another train with his wife.[13] He may also sue for loss of, or injury to, baggage belonging to his wife, where he travels with her,[14] where, having a free pass, he buys a ticket for his wife and delivers her trunk to the railroad company without informing the company that it is not his,[15] or where property used by the wife is community property and she consented to its transportation by the husband, notwithstanding she was not a passenger.[16]

According to some cases the wife may properly be joined with her husband in an action for the loss of her baggage, as shown infra § 895, and the right of a husband and wife to maintain an action for the wife's baggage which is not her separate property is not affected by the fact that the husband was traveling with the wife without a ticket and without paying fare.[17] It has been held that where the legal title to the property constituting the baggage is in the wife, she is the proper person to sue;[18] but if the wife knowingly permits her husband to sue for the loss of her property, and aids him in so doing, she is estopped to sue for the same again in her own name.[19]

Parent and child. A father may sue for the loss of baggage, consisting of wearing apparel and jewelry, which he has provided for the use of his infant daughter.[20] A father paying full fare for himself and traveling with an infant child of such tender years that by custom no fare is demanded for its carriage, may recover on the contract of carriage for loss of, or injury to, articles bought and used for the child, which articles are part of the father's baggage.[21]

Conditions precedent. It has been held that a state statutory provision requiring a demand in writing before bringing a suit against a common carrier has no application to a suit for loss of baggage during interstate transportation.[22] In case of trover for baggage wrongfully detained, a demand upon the directors of the company for the baggage need not be made; it is sufficient if the demand is made on its agents who are charged with the duty of receiving, keeping, and delivering baggage.[23]

§ 895. Parties

A wife may properly be joined with her husband in an action for loss of her baggage. In the case of interstate transportation of baggage, the initial carrier and a succeeding carrier which actually causes the loss may be joined as defendants in some jurisdictions.

According to some cases a wife may properly be joined with her husband in an action for the loss of her baggage.[24] Under the practice in some jurisdictions, the initial carrier and a succeeding carrier which actually causes the loss of baggage transported between states may be sued jointly in the same action.[25]

Various questions as to who may sue for loss of, or injury to, baggage have arisen, as considered above in § 894.

§ 896. Pleading

Plaintiff should plead the facts on which his right to recover is based, and defendant should plead facts constituting an affirmative defense. It is permissible to consider, as an element of a cause of action or as a ground of defense, only such matters as are properly put in issue by the pleadings and proof, and the proof should correspond with the pleadings.

General rules apply in an action against a carrier for delay in delivery of, loss of, or injury to, a passenger's baggage, with respect to the complaint, declaration, or petition,[26] or plea or an-

26. Negligence
(1) Where the carrier is under the duty to exercise ordinary care in respect of a harp shipped in a case marked "fragile, handle with care," a recovery for injury may be had under a count charging ordinary negligence.—Perkins v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 122 N.E. 306, 232 Mass. 336.

swer,[27] or replication or reply.[28] Accordingly the complaint, petition, or declaration should allege facts showing the right to carriage of the baggage,[29] a delivery of the baggage to the carrier,[30] and some breach of duty on the part of the carrier.[31] So also, plaintiff's pleading should describe the articles lost or injured, and the extent of the loss or damage;[32] and, if special damages are claimed, it should allege facts showing notice to the carrier that it would be subject to special damages in case of nondelivery.[33] In an action for delay in delivery, however, the view has been taken that it is not necessary to itemize the articles involved.[34] Furthermore it is not necessary to describe the receptacle containing the articles as baggage.[35]

The declaration for lost baggage need not aver that plaintiff was a passenger, as this fact may be proved without averment by the possession of the baggage check and ticket,[36] or by the check alone, if it appears that such checks are not given until the passenger tickets are shown;[37] nor is it necessary to allege that the hire for carrying the baggage was part of the money paid for the ticket.[38]

Failure specifically to allege that defendant is a common carrier does not render a petition insufficient where the allegations of the petition show that defendant is such a carrier.[39] Where the pe-

Showing relation of carrier and passenger

Carrier by bus

In an action to recover for the loss of a hand bag and contents against a carrier by bus, allegations in the petition in reference to the carrying of passengers for hire, the giving of the hand bag into the possession of defendant, and the location of one of defendant's termini were sufficient to designate defendant as a common carrier, in view of a lack of denial that defendant was a common carrier and of lack of evidence that it was not a common carrier.—Cleveland-Akron Bus Co. v. Rogoff, 159 N.E. 374, 25 Ohio App. 538.

tition states the facts and charges the carrier generally, it is sufficient, and if the carrier is liable, either as carrier or as warehouseman, plaintiff is entitled to recover;[40] and the rule that the specific acts of negligence relied on must be pleaded does not apply to an action by a passenger for the destruction of his baggage before a reasonable time for its removal had elapsed.[41]

A complaint against a connecting carrier for loss of baggage should allege that the carriers were joint contractors, or that the connecting carrier had received the baggage.[42]

It has been held that a plea setting up a limitation of liability to a certain amount is insufficient where it neither shows a special contract entered into in consideration of reduced charges or special concessions nor negatives the unreasonableness of the limitation.[43]

The court may in a proper case and in the exercise of a sound discretion permit an amendment of the complaint to conform to the proofs.[44]

Issues, proof, and variance. Only such matters as are properly put in issue by the pleadings and proof may be considered as an element of the cause of action, or as grounds of defense,[45] and the proof must correspond with the pleadings.[46] An issue may be raised by plaintiff's denial in his reply of allegations in the answer, notwithstanding the petition contains no allegations as to the subject matter of such issue.[47]

Where the cause of action alleged in the petition is a loss of baggage in interstate transportation which is governed by federal laws, defendant is not deprived of a defense thereunder, under its general traverse, because of pleading a special defense founded on a state law.[48]

A carrier sued for the loss of baggage consisting of wearing apparel may not prove that the articles had a market value as second-hand articles and prove second-hand value; nor may it show that the passenger was a gambler and that he had in his trunk, in addition to the wearing apparel, a gambler's complete outfit.[49] In an action against a person employed to transfer plaintiff's suit case and contents to a railroad station, plaintiff may recover without proving the market value of the suit case and of the contents which consisted of wearing apparel, where such suit case and wearing apparel, because of use or other reasons, had no market value.[50]

§ 897. Evidence

a. Burden of proof and presumptions
b. Admissibility
c. Weight and sufficiency

a. Burden of Proof and Presumptions

The plaintiff has the burden of proving the elements of his cause of action; the defendant carrier has the burden of proving facts which constitute an affirmative defense and of rebutting presumptions favorable to the plaintiff. In general proof of delivery of baggage in good condition to the carrier and of the carrier's failure to redeliver or redelivery in bad condition raises a presumption in support of the plaintiff's right to recover which casts on the defendant carrier the burden of proving facts which relieve it of liability.

In an action against a carrier for the delay of, loss of, or injury to, baggage, the burden in the first instance is on plaintiff to prove the elements of his cause of action,[51] such as the delivery of

Proving custom as evidence of fact in issue

In an action for loss of a trunk, proof of custom or usage, as to the delivery of trunks to the carrier, that it was customary to put them outside on the platform, was admissible as an evidentiary fact showing delivery, even in absence of allegation in the petition as to such custom.—Hines v Talbert, Tex Civ.App, 229 S.W. 679.

10 C.J. p 1233 note 53.

Money as baggage

In the case of money carried by a passenger in a trunk which is destroyed, it is necessary to prove that the money was carried bona fide for traveling expenses and personal use his baggage to the carrier,[52] and that the loss did not occur before the baggage came into defendant's possession,[53] or after it left its possession.[54] In the case of baggage or personal effects taken into a coach and not checked as baggage, the burden is on plaintiff to show that they were lost through the carrier's negligence,[55] and, in some jurisdictions, that the passenger was not guilty of contributory negligence.[56]

Where plaintiff shows delivery of the baggage in good condition to the carrier, and the latter's failure to deliver the same, or that there was a loss or injury to the baggage when delivered to him, he makes out a prima facie case,[57] and it is then incumbent on defendant, in order to avoid liability, to show a proper delivery,[58] or that it has not converted the baggage,[59] or otherwise to explain why it has not been delivered, in such a way as to relieve the carrier of liability.[60] So, where plaintiff proves the receipt of the baggage by the carrier and the loss or injury while in its possession, it is then incumbent on the carrier to excuse itself by showing that the loss was caused by an act of God or of the public enemy, or by some inevitable accident,[61] or that its liability had been changed to that of a warehouseman.[62]

It has been held or recognized that, where the circumstances are such as to show that the carrier held the baggage as a warehouseman, the burden is on plaintiff to prove want of care on the part of defendant as the proximate cause of the loss or injury.[63] Where, however, negligence is the basis of the action, proof of delivery to the carrier and failure to account for the property without explanation is sufficient to raise a presumption of negligence and to cast on the carrier the burden to show that the baggage has not been lost or injured through its negligence.[64] Even where baggage is delivered to a carrier as gratuion the trip.—San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Green, Tex.Civ.App., 170 S.W. 110.

Removing trunk within reasonable time

Where certain articles were stolen from a trunk while it was in defendant carrier's baggage room during the night after the arrival of the passenger and her baggage, and there was neither allegation nor proof of negligence, the view was expressed that plaintiff was not entitled to recover without showing that she had called for her trunk within a reasonable time.—Church v. 10 C.J. p. 1233 note 60.

Transfer company

In an action in conversion against a transfer company, based on a loss of baggage which was received by it for transfer and which was not delivered to the railroad company, defendant has the burden of explaining the manner of the loss where it admitted that it received the baggage and alleged that it had delivered it to the railroad company.—Stine v. Hines, 181 N.W. 321, 148 Minn. 132.

Liability as bailee

In an action tried on the theory that the carrier would be liable as bailee, and treated as one in which negligence was charged, it was held that the carrier had burden to show that trunk was rifled in transit, and not while awaiting transportation.—Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Bryant, Tex.Civ.App., 11 S.W.2d 659, error refused.

Transfer company

Where the evidence of both parties shows that defendant transfer company had taken charge of plaintiff's trunks, had them in its possession, and had been paid the charges to deliver them at plaintiff's residence, and that the trunks and their contents became watersoaked while in defendant's possession, there is a prima facie case for plaintiff, and defendant has the burden of proving its defense that the injury was caused by an act of God. If the evidence of the transfer company offered to establish the defense that the loss was caused by an act of God tends to show that the negligence of the company concurred to produce the damage it has the burden of showing that its negligence did not directly contribute to cause the damage.—Ford v. Wabash Ry. Co., 300 S.W. 769, 318 Mo. 723, reversing, App., 266 S.W. 1032.

Transfer and storage company

Where plaintiff, as an arriving passenger, delivered his baggage check to a transfer company with directions to obtain the baggage and to store it until called for, the burden of proof as to negligence was on plaintiff in an action against the transfer company, as bailee, for loss of the baggage and failure to deliver to plaintiff.—Hamilton v. Baggage & Omnibus Transfer Co., 192 P. 1058, 97 Or. 620.

64. Mich.—Blair v. Pennsylvania

tous bailee, there may be an inference or presumption of negligence, according to some cases, where the carrier fails to redeliver to the owner, or loses, the baggage, and the carrier has the burden to rebut the presumption that the loss was caused by its negligence.[65] Where, however, plaintiff who seeks to recover from defendant carrier as a warehouseman had knowledge of the destruction of the baggage by fire before making formal demand therefor, failure to deliver on demand does not raise a presumption of want of care or of negligence on the part of the carrier, and plaintiff must show affirmatively that the destruction of the baggage was caused by the negligence of defendant or its agent.[66]

In an action based wholly on defendant's liability as a common carrier, defendant has the burden of proving that there was due compliance with the applicable statute as to the filing and posting of schedules in order successfully to claim the benefit of the provisions of schedules affecting its liability, and, while in sustaining this burden, defendant is entitled to the benefit of the presumption that the statute has fully been complied with where noncompliance is penalized, such presumption is not conclusive and the burden of proof remains on defendant unless the proof and the inferences are all in its favor.[67]

Where a passenger riding on a pass, and accompanied by his son who is riding on a ticket, has two bundles checked as baggage, it may be assumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary that the bundle containing his own property was checked on his pass.[68]

Limitation of liability. The burden of proving limitation of liability is on defendant carrier,[69] including the conditions on which the existence of the right to claim a limitation depends.[70] Thus it has been held that the burden of proof is on defendant to establish that there was a contract fairly and honestly made limiting its liability.[71]

According to some cases, there is a presumption that, under some circumstances, a passenger

(1) That hand bag of passenger was lost after delivery to conductor in charge of train, to be carried by him from coach when passenger was leaving, raised inference of loss by his negligence.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Barksdale, 124 S.E. 362, 32 Ga.App. 643.

(2) In an action against a carrier by bus based on negligence, proof by plaintiff passenger of loss of hand bag taken in charge by agent of defendant established a prima facie case of negligence.

Seizure of intoxicating liquors included as baggage

Where plaintiff seeks to charge defendant carrier, as a gratuitous bailee, for the loss of proper and lawful baggage which was seized by government officers, together with intoxicating liquors included as baggage, while in defendant's possession, it has been held that the burden is on defendant to prove that it exercised the care required of a gratuitous bailee to preserve the proper and lawful baggage after the presence of the intoxicating liquors was discovered.—Shannon v. Matters which carrier must prove

That ticket sold to passenger contained stipulation for limitation of liability, and that tariffs containing provision for limitation of liability were on file with various state regulatory bodies — Williams v. Pickwick-Greyhound Lines, 131 So. 860, 15 La.App. 344.

Transfer company

Even though plaintiff had assented to a so-called contract with a transfer company containing a provision that, if the property in question exceeds a specific value, the company's liability to the extent of the full value shall be limited to that of an involuntary bailee, being for willful negligence only, the view was expressed by Thomson, J., that, in order to avoid liability for the full value, defendant had the burden of proving that the loss was not occasioned by its willful negligence.—Stanfield v. Frank Parmelee Co., 223 Ill.App. 199.

Transfer company

(1) Where a transfer company relies on a limitation of liability on the theory that the traveler accepted a receipt containing notice of the limitation, the company has the burden of proving the special contract
La.—Lawes v. New Orleans Transfer Co., 123 So. 144, 11 La.App. 170.
N.Y.—Morgan v. Woolverton, 120 N.Y.S. 1008, 136 App.Div. 351, affirmed 96 N.E. 354, 203 N.Y. 52, 36 L.R.A.,N.S., 640.
10 C.J. p 142 note 80.

(2) The view was expressed by Thomson, J., in specially concurring, that, where defendant transfer company sought to claim the benefit of a limitation of liability for loss of baggage, the burden was on it to show that plaintiff had knowledge that defendant was a carrier of baggage only, and not a common carrier of goods, in its relation to plaintiff, in view of the rule that a carrier of baggage only may not limit its liability unless knowledge of the status of the carrier in that regard is brought home to the owner of the property carried.—Stanfield v. Frank Parmelee Co., 223 Ill.App. 199.

who accepts a ticket containing a provision for limitation of the carrier's liability does so with the knowledge of the contents of the ticket and with the intention to be bound thereby,[72] and that the holder of the ticket read or was advised of the limitation.[73] So the acceptance and use by an interstate passenger of a railroad ticket which purports to limit liability are sufficient to establish an agreement which is prima facie valid, and the mere failure of the passenger to read matter plainly placed before him does not overcome the presumption of assent.[74] The view has been taken, however that the passenger's assent may not be presumed where he can neither read nor write and he has no knowledge of the provisions of the ticket.[75]

Connecting carriers. In the case of transportation of baggage over the lines of connecting carriers, it is necessary for plaintiff to show in some manner that the loss occurred in transit,[76] but, where the loss or destruction of the baggage has been shown, there is a presumption that the initial carrier is responsible as shown above in § 890, and such carrier has the burden or onus of proving that the loss did not occur while the baggage was in its possession,[77] as, for example, by showing delivery to the connecting carrier in the condition in which the baggage was received from the passenger.[78] So, where there is a presumption that loss of, or injury to, baggage occurred through the fault of the last carrier, based on failure to deliver to the passenger or on delivery in bad condition, considered above in § 890, in general such carrier has the burden of rebutting such presumption,[79] as, for example, by showing that baggage delivered to the passenger in bad condition was in the same condition when received by such carrier.[80] In view of the fact that, notwithstanding the Carmack amendment, there is a presumption that, in the case of interstate transportation, baggage shown to have been delivered in good condition to the initial carrier, remained in that condition at the time of delivery to the last carrier, and that the loss or injury occurred while in the possession of the last carrier, as shown above in § 890, the last carrier may not avoid liability unless it rebuts such presumption.[81]

The view has been taken that, in order to charge an intermediate carrier for a loss of baggage, plaintiff has the burden of proving definitely and specifically that the loss occurred on the line of such carrier,[82] and that the fact that baggage was in bad condition on reaching destination does not create a presumption against an intermediate carrier, as shown above in § 890, and does not cast on the intermediate carrier the burden of proving that it delivered the baggage in good condition to the next connecting carrier.[83] There is authority for the view, however, that, where the initial carrier shows a delivery of the baggage to the next connecting carrier which is an intermediate carrier, in the condition in which it was received from the passenger, the presumption against the initial carrier is rebutted and transferred to such connecting carrier, as shown above in § 890, and that the burden of rebutting such presumption is cast on such connecting carrier.[84]

Where the carrier claims that the contract for transporting the baggage over connecting lines was illegal, as being in violation of federal statutes, it has the burden of maintaining this claim.[85]

Possession of baggage check or receipt. The possession of a baggage check is prima facie evidence that the carrier has received and has not delivered the piece of baggage represented by it.[86]

While the presumption or prima facie proof of delivery to the carrier based on possession of a baggage check or receipt, by another, may in general be rebutted by the carrier's evidence, or want of delivery to the carrier may be shown by evidence adduced by plaintiff passenger, under some circumstances such presumption or proof may be rebutted only by direct proof by the carrier that the baggage was never received by it, as shown below in subdivision c of this section, and the passenger need not prove that the carrier actually received the baggage, until the carrier has rebutted the constructive delivery evidenced by the check by proof that it never received the baggage.[87] The fact of possession of the check, together with proof that the baggage could not be found when inquired for and demanded by the passenger, raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier.[88]

Such check is also prima facie evidence of the holder's ownership of the baggage,[89] and that the baggage was received by the carrier in good condition.[90]

Where a passenger delivers a check to the agent of a connecting line and receives its check in exchange therefor, the presumption is, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the baggage has been received in due course by the latter line, and it is responsible therefor.[91]

b. Admissibility

General rules as to the admissibility of evidence apply in actions for loss of, injury to, or delay in delivery of, baggage.

General rules governing the admissibility of evidence apply in actions against a carrier for the delay of, injury to, or loss of, baggage.[92] Thus competent and relevant evidence as to the capacity in which defendant acted in dealing with the baggage is admissible where the question is in issue,[93] as is competent and relevant evidence as to the nature and value of the baggage, for the purpose of enabling the jury to find its value.[94] In an action for delay in delivering baggage, the owner may testify that he contracted with the carrier to transmit it to a certain point, without producing his check.[95] In an action for delay in delivering the baggage of a traveling salesman, whereby he was unable to sell goods, evidence that the time of the year was that in which his business was most active is admissible.[96]

Questions as to the competency as witnesses of parties or persons interested in the result of actions of the type here under consideration generally are considered in the C.J.S. title Witnesses § 129, also 70 C.J. page 201 notes 76, 77.

Admissions of agents of carrier. The declarations or admissions of an agent or servant of the company, with regard to the cause or circumstances of a loss of baggage, are not admissible against the carrier, unless shown to have been made within the authority of such servant or agent,[97] or to have been a part of the res gestæ.[98]

Regulations of, or schedules filed with, interstate commerce commission. In an action for the loss of the hand bag of an interstate passenger, it has been held that a regulation of the interstate commerce commission limiting liability for baggage was properly excluded on the theory that the particular regulation in question did not apply to hand baggage.[99] It has been held, however, that schedules duly filed with the interstate commerce commission by a carrier, containing a provision for limitation of liability, are admissible on behalf of defendant in an action against a terminal association for loss of baggage transported in interstate commerce which was delivered to defendant by the carrier, where the loss occurred before the termination of the responsibility of the carrier as such and the question as to whether defendant acted as the agent of the carrier in respect of the baggage is in issue.[1]

c. Weight and Sufficiency

General rules governing the weight and sufficiency of evidence apply in actions for loss of, injury to, or delay in delivery of, baggage.

Rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence applicable in civil actions generally, apply in an action against a carrier for loss of, injury to, or delay in the delivery of, baggage.[2] In gen-

(8) To support judgment for plaintiff where the question involved was at what point or by whom baggage checks were mixed.—Goodman v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 191 N.Y.S. 275.

(9) To support verdict for plaintiff based on alleged negligence of defendant carrier in failing to prevent destruction of baggage by fire after arrival at destination.—Chesa-

eral, in order that a particular fact in issue may be regarded as established, it must be proved by a preponderance of evidence.[3]

Loss of baggage may sufficiently be established by proof of delivery to the carrier and failure to deliver it at its destination, even without demand and refusal, if there is other evidence of loss;[4] but mere proof of nondelivery without proof of demand and refusal, or other evidence of loss, is not sufficient to show a conversion.[5]

The admission as to the value of lost baggage made by an immigrant to a steamship company on a printed blank and signed only by mark will not as a matter of law be given more weight than the immigrant's positive statement as to the actual value given at the trial.[6]

The issuance of a check for baggage and possession of it by the passenger is prima facie proof that the carrier has received the baggage, as shown above in subsection 897 a, and, while not conclusive on defendant carrier, such evidence is sufficient, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to show that the baggage was delivered to defendant and that it is liable for loss of the baggage.[7]

Rebutting presumptions. An inference of negligence arising from a carrier's failure to account for the loss of baggage which had been stored with it is not overcome by evidence showing that the building used for the storage was safe and secure, in charge of trusty agents and servants, and properly guarded by day and night.[8] The presumption of negligence arising from the derailment of a train, by reason of which a passenger's baggage was destroyed, is not rebutted by evidence that the derailment and wrecking of the train were caused by a slide of dirt and rocks.[9]

Prima facie evidence that baggage was in good order when received by the carrier may be overcome by proof showing that it was not in good order when received, or by proof showing that it was in the same condition when received by the carrier as when delivered to the passenger at destination.[10]

In general the presumption or prima facie proof that the carrier has received baggage, which is based on the possession of a baggage check or receipt by another, considered above in subdivision a of this section, may be rebutted by the carrier's proof, or want of delivery to the carrier may be shown by evidence adduced by plaintiff passenger,[11] but, under some circumstances, such presumption or proof may be rebutted only by direct proof by the carrier that the baggage was never received by it.[12]

Offer to compromise not admission of liability. A mere offer by the carrier to compromise a claim against it is not conclusive evidence of its liability, nor is it entitled to any weight, unless the circumstances are such as to make it tantamount to an admission of liability.[13]

§ 898. Trial in General

Questions as to what are questions of fact, as to instructions, and as to verdicts and findings are considered below in §§ 899-901.

§ 899. Questions of Law and Fact

Where the evidence as to a matter in issue is conflicting or will reasonably support different inferences, the question is one of fact for the jury, or for the court as trier of the facts, to determine. Where, however, the evidence is insufficient or is undisputed, or is such that reasonable minds can reach but one conclusion, the question is one for the court to determine.

As in other civil cases, where the evidence on a matter in issue is conflicting, or is such that reasonable minds might come to different conclusions therefrom, the question is one of fact for determination by the jury or by the court as trier of the facts on a trial without a jury.[14] On the other hand, where the evidence is insufficient or

In an action against terminal company for loss of trunk while acting as warehouseman, question as to liability of defendant was under the evidence, one of fact for the trial court in a case tried without a jury.—Bowles v. Payne, Mo.App., 251 S.W. 101.

Uncontradicted evidence

In a passenger's action for the loss of her trunk and contents, where her evidence showed that the journey was an intra-state one, and defendant offered no evidence on that point, a verdict was properly directed for plaintiff, where such direction was otherwise proper, in view of the rule that the trial judge may direct a verdict where defendant offers no evidence and the evidence of plaintiff points all one way.—Herndon v Southern Ry. Jewelry retained in passenger's possession

(1) On a motion to set aside dismissal of complaint on the pleadings and the opening of plaintiff's counsel in an action for the loss of jewelry which plaintiff passenger had momentarily left on a table in defendant carrier's dining car, in which the court regarded the carrier as an insurer because of its refusal to take custody of the jewelry for transportation as baggage, the view was taken that it could not be held, as a matter of law, that the loss was due to plaintiff's own act so as to relieve the carrier of liability, at least in the absence of the development of detailed facts by the taking of evidence.—Borden v New York Cent. R. Co., 162 N.Y.S. 1099, 98 Misc. 574

(2) On an appeal subsequently taken in the same case from a judgment for plaintiff based on a verdict, the view was taken that the contributory negligence of plaintiff was a complete defense, if not as a matter of law, at least as shown by his ticket,[25] or on a check or receipt given to him,[26] or posted by the carrier in its baggage room;[27] whether the passenger had made a declaration of value or was limited to the maximum specified in the tariff rule;[28] whether the carrier had complied with a statute requiring filing and posting of schedules containing limitation of liability;[29] whether the loss or injury was caused by an act of God,[30] whether a certain occurrence was an act of God;[31] whether carrier's negligence concurred with act of God in causing loss or injury;[32] whether the carrier exercised due care or was guilty of negligence;[33] whether the carrier exercised ordinary care, as warehouseman, in storing and caring for the baggage;[34] whether there was willfulness on the part of the carrier's

(1) The question whether the party receiving a receipt from a transfer company containing a provision for limitation of liability, accepted it with notice of its contents, or with notice that it contained the terms of a special contract, so as to require him to acquaint himself with its contents, is one of evidence to be determined by the jury.—Lawes v. New Orleans Transfer Co., 123 So. 144, 11 La.App. 170, quoting Corpus Juris text—10 C.J. p. 142 note 82.

(2) In an action for loss of baggage, where it appeared that defendant transfer company received plaintiff's trunk and delivered a claim check, limiting liability to one hundred dollars, under the evidence it was a question for the jury whether or not plaintiff in accepting the claim check had actual or constructive knowledge of the liability printed thereon.—Stine v. Hines, 181 N.W. 321, 148 Minn. 132.

Bailment with transfer and storage company

Bailor of trunk with transfer and storage company was not as a matter of law bound by the unknown terms in fine print on a small pasteboard check reasonably understood by her to be a mere voucher or token for identification of the trunk, and accepted as such by her without objection.—Hamilton v. Baggage & Omnibus Transfer Co., 192 P. 1058, 97 Or. 620.

State statute

Notwithstanding the presumption that there has been due compliance by defendant carrier with statutory requirements as to filing and posting of schedules, on provisions of which the carrier relies to relieve itself of liability, the question as to whether there has been due compliance is for the jury unless the proof and inferences are all in favor of defendant.—Simpson v. Baggage lost in dark and crowded car

In an action by a passenger who lost his baggage while riding in a dark and crowded car, the question as to whether the carrier exercised due care in putting him into such car was for the jury.—Keith v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 99 S.E. 812, 112 S.C. 297.

Handling of case marked "fragile"

Where defendant carrier claimed the benefit of a provision of its tariff that cases marked "fragile" or in any other manner indicating that the contents are of a fragile nature and likely to be damaged by "ordinary handling" will not be accepted except at owner's risk, and the phrase "ordinary handling" was construed to mean nothing more than the ordinary wear and tear necessarily incidental to transportation where reasonable care is used by the carrier, questions as to whether injury to harp in case marked "fragile" was caused by the way case was handled and as to whether handling was in ordinary way were for jury.—Perkins v. New York, N.H. & H.R. Co., 122 N.E. 306, 232 Mass. 336

Negligence as proximate cause

Negligence of porter and railroad as proximate cause of loss where passenger's suitcase could not be found was question for jury.—Girden v. Thompson, 136 A. 407, 5 N.J.Misc. 272 affirmed 138 A. 920, 104 N.J.Law 169.

Undisputed evidence

Although evidence that plaintiff's baggage, which he had left at the station preparatory to checking, was injured by water when the carrier's water tower fell and flooded the platform, and that the tower had been in a defective condition and leaning in the direction of the platform for some time, was undisputed, the determination of the carrier's negligence under the facts was for the jury, not for the court, so that a directed verdict for plaintiff was reversible error.—Reis v. Minneapolis & St. L. Ry. Co., 179 N.W. 83, 189 Iowa 988.

34. Mich.—Fraam v. Grand Rapids, etc., R. Co., 126 N.W. 851, 161 Mich. 556, 29 L.R.A.,N.S., 834, 21 Ann.Cas. 96.
10 C.J. p. 1238 note 12.

Gratuitous bailee

Proof of delivery to carrier and of its failure to deliver baggage, which, without the carrier's fault, did not accompany the passenger, is evidence of negligence sufficient to carry case to jury, although carrier was merely a gratuitous bailee thereof; but the jury should be instructed that carrier is not liable unless it failed to exercise the care of a person of ordinary prudence.—Midgett v. Eastern Carolina Transp. Co., 104 S.E. 32, 180 N.C. 71.

servants in not properly caring for baggage, as affecting award of punitive damages;[35] or whether there was an actual conversion of the baggage by the carrier.[36]

The right of the carrier to limit its liability is for the court.[37]

What constitutes baggage. The question as to what a passenger is entitled to carry with him as baggage depends on a variety of circumstances, as shown supra §§ 855-861, and the question as to whether any particular article, or property, may properly be deemed baggage, in view of the nature of the journey and the circumstances and condition of the passenger, is generally for the jury, under proper instructions from the court, or for the court as trier of the facts on a trial without a jury.[38] The question, however, becomes one of law for the court, where the facts are not disputed, or are such that reasonable minds can come to but one conclusion therefrom,[39] and in some cases the court may say, as a matter of law, that certain articles cannot be classed as baggage.[40] Whether certain jewelry exceeds in value that usually carried by passengers of the same station and character as plaintiff, and therefore is not properly baggage, is ordinarily a question for the jury.[41] Whether a particular sum of money is, under the circumstances, reasonably necessary for a passenger to carry is generally a question for the jury.[42]

The reasonableness of a regulation of a carrier as to the checking or carriage of baggage,[43] or of a regulation or stipulation limiting liability,[44] is a question of fact for the determination of the jury, under proper instructions from the court;[45] but if the facts are undisputed, the question is a proper one for the court to determine.[46]

§ 900. Instructions

The rules governing instructions in civil actions generally apply in actions for injury to, or loss of, baggage.

As in other civil actions, the instructions, in an action for the delay of, injury to, or loss of, baggage, must fully and clearly state the law applicable to the facts of the case,[47] defining the various terms and expressions used.[48] The instructions must be applicable to the issues raised by the pleadings and the evidence,[49] must not ignore material issues,[50] and must not invade the province of the jury by charging on the facts, or on the weight of evidence, where such a charge is not permissible in civil actions generally.[51] restrict the issues presented by the evidence, and the evidence must support the verdict.

As in civil actions generally, a special issue submitted to the jury for a finding should not restrict or narrow the issues presented by the evidence.[52] The verdict must be supported by the evidence.[53]

A finding that a railroad company is liable for the loss of articles from a trunk and for injuries to the trunk has been regarded as a finding of law and not a finding of fact, where the undisputed evidence shows that the trunk was delivered to the railroad company in good order and was redelivered in damaged condition, without any explanation as to how the damage occurred.[54]

§ 902. Damages for Delay

The measure of damages for delay in the delivery of baggage, due to the negligence of the carrier, is the value of the use of the property during the period of delay, together with certain incidental expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the delay.

For delay in the delivery of baggage due to the negligence of a carrier, according to the rule stated in Corpus Juris and quoted with approval, the passenger is entitled to recover the value of the use of the property during the time of such delay, and such incidental expenses and damages as were in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made, including in some cases expenses incurred in reasonable efforts to trace the baggage.[55] Under some circumstances, the measure of the value of the use of clothing which is part of the baggage is the difference between the cost of clothing purchased and the value at the time of delivery of the baggage.[56] It has been held, however, that the value of articles of clothing purchased by the passenger is not an element of damages where such articles can be used on other occasions and he received value for the money paid for such articles.[57]

Where the carrier accepts baggage with notice that the passenger requires it at a certain place at a certain time for a special purpose, the measure of damages is the injury to the special business attributable to the delay, including the expense and the loss of time incurred in a search for the delayed baggage;[58] but this does not include speculative profits arising on the mere hope of particular future transactions.[59] In case of delay in transporting or delivering a traveling salesman's samples, he is entitled to recover compensation for time lost and for actual reasonable expenses during the delay.[60] Loss of profits or other special damages arising from a failure to deliver baggage in time cannot, however, be recovered unless the carrier had notice, at the time of receiving the baggage, of the special circumstances which would render such damages probable in the event of delay.[61]

While the view has been taken that, where the articles transported as baggage have depreciated in value during the delay, the difference in value may be allowed as damages,[62] such rule does not apply where there was no intention to sell the articles thus carried,[63] or where plaintiff seeks to recover for damages consequential to the delay of his journey through defendant carrier's de-

In Oklahoma
(1) The measure of damages for a carrier's delay in forwarding the sample trunks of a traveling salesman is the value of the use of the property during the delay, together with loss of time occasioned thereby, where the carrier's agent received the trunks with knowledge of the contents and intended use. The damages recoverable in such case include loss of time and inability to make sales, directly occasioned by the carrier's breach of duty.—Kansas City, etc., R. Co. v. Fugatt, 150 P. 669, 47 Okl. 727.
(2) As otherwise stated, where a carrier accepts and checks as baggage sample trunks of a traveling salesman with knowledge of their character, loss of time and inability to make sales because of delay in receiving trunks containing samples, and necessary and reasonable traveling expenses incurred in looking for the trunks or procuring other samples, will be regarded as within the contemplation of the carrier, so as to entitle such salesman to recover damages therefor, in case of such delay.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Freeman, 198 P. 298, 82 Okl. 6, 25 A.L.R. 72.

fault, and not for any supposed loss or damage caused by the delay as affecting the property involved or its marketable value.[64] A statute authorizing the recovery of damages due to detention of baggage refers to damage to the baggage on that account and not to detention of the passenger on account of delay of his baggage.[65]

Where the carrier accepts a trunk which contains articles which are not baggage, under the belief that the property offered is baggage, there cannot be a recovery of special damages for delay in transit.[66]

Mental suffering and inconvenience. In accordance with the rule generally recognized that mental pain and suffering will not alone constitute a sufficient basis for the recovery of substantial damages, stated in C.J.S. title Damages § 64, also 17 C. J. page 831 note 54, mental suffering or worry due to the delay in delivering baggage to the passenger is not an element of the damages recoverable.[67] Furthermore mere inconvenience due to such delay is not an element of damages,[68] especially not inconvenience which the passenger has the means of overcoming.[69]

Nominal damages may be recovered for an unreasonable delay, in the absence of proof of special damages.[70]

Exemplary damages may be recovered for a willful or wanton delay in transporting and delivering baggage,[71] or where the negligence causing the delay is so gross and reckless as to assume the nature of wantonness and willfulness.[72] Where, however, the carrier makes an earnest effort to trace and deliver the delayed baggage, an inference of willful misconduct is not warranted, and exemplary damages cannot be recovered for the delay.[73]

§ 903. Damages for Loss or Injury

In the case of loss of baggage, the measure of damages is in general the actual value of the articles to the owner at the time of the loss. In the case of injury to baggage, the measure of damage is in general the difference between the actual value of the articles injured just prior to the injury and their actual value just after the injury

As a general rule the measure of damages for the loss of baggage is the actual value to the owner of the articles constituting the baggage at the time of the loss,[74] taking into consideration the cost of the articles, the extent of their use, and their condition at the time of the loss,[75] together with interest from the date of the loss,[76] although, where a valid limitation of liability to a specified amount is applicable under the rules stated above in § 875, it has been held that neither interest nor damages for delay may be recovered.[77] The full value of the baggage is recoverable in case of loss or failure to deliver, up to the amount fixed as the maximum amount of recovery in a valid agreement or regulation.[78] If the articles lost have a market value, that is the correct

Baggage of members of family in one trunk

In the case of the loss of baggage transported in interstate commerce, which was subject to a provision for limitation contained in a tariff published in accordance with federal statutes regulating interstate commerce, an award of two hundred fifty dollars was upheld where the baggage belonged to a married man, his wife, and their small child, the baggage was all transported in one trunk, and the limitation in the applicable tariff was construed to permit an award of one hundred dollars each for the baggage of the husband and wife and fifty dollars for that of the child.

Tex.—Payne v. Norman, Civ.App., 249 S.W. 882.

Conversion

A carrier delivering the baggage of an intra-state passenger to the wrong person was liable to the rightful owner under Rev.St 1919 § 10449, for its full value.—Boone v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., Mo.App., 263 S.W. 495, certiorari granted Missouri Pac R. Co v. Boone, 45 S Ct. 196, 266 U S. 600, 69 L Ed. 461, affirmed 46 S.Ct. 341, 270 U S. 466, 70 L Ed. 688.

measure of damages;[79] but as a passenger's baggage usually consists of clothing, and the like, which have no proper market value, the value of such articles is generally not merely what they might have been sold for in money at public or private sale, but their pecuniary value to their owner, not including any sentimental value.[80] This value is to be measured at the place of destination,[81] or at the place of delivery to the carrier, unless it appears that there is a difference in the value at that place and at the place of destination.[82]

The measure of damages for injury to baggage is the difference in the actual value of the same just prior to the injury and the actual value thereof just subsequent thereto,[83] and not the difference in the market value of similar articles at such time at the nearest place where such market obtains.[84] The proper method of arriving at its value at the time of injury is to take into consideration the cost of the articles constituting the baggage, the extent of their use, and their condition at the time of the injury.[85] Interest from the date of suit may be awarded.[86]

Some statutes limiting the carrier's liability for baggage do not prevent recovery of a larger amount where the liability is that of warehouseman.[87]

Effect of subsequent tender of baggage. In an action for loss of baggage which is subsequently tendered by the carrier, the measure of damages is any loss and expense occasioned by the delay, together with the value of the baggage at the time and place it should have been delivered, taking therefrom the value according to its condition at the time and place of actual delivery or tender.[88] Where part of the lost baggage is restored to the owner, although some of it may be damaged, yet if the tender is made within a reasonable time the owner must receive it, and he is then limited, in his right to recover, to the value of the part not returned and to the extent of the injury done to that returned.[89] However, a passenger cannot be compelled to accept a tender a year after the loss of the baggage.[90]

Special damages. Unless the carrier was informed of the special circumstances, or such circumstances might reasonably be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties, special damages for the loss of, or injury to, baggage cannot be recovered,[91] such as the extra expense incurred on account of such loss,[92] the expense of searching for the lost baggage,[93] and attorney's fees in bringing the action.[94] Losses and expenses, in addition to the value of lost baggage may, however, be recovered if they may be regarded as within the contemplation of the parties,[95] and, as to such additional losses and expenses, the carrier is not relieved of liability by

Partial loss

In the case of a partial loss of baggage, checked on the lower of two alternative rates based on values, the agreed valuation does not fix an arbitrary limit of recovery, but a ratio, the proportion being the amount which the real value of the lost articles bears to the actual value of the entire baggage checked.—Robidoux v. Expenses

(1) It has been held that, under certain circumstances, the expenses incurred in searching for lost baggage may be recovered.—Ross v St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 170 S.W. 920, 185 Mo.App. 154—10 C.J. p 1219 note 90.

(2) In an action against a person who, acting as an agent of a railroad company, had employed plaintiff as a laborer for such company, and had agreed to be responsible for plaintiff's baggage in connection with transportation to the place of employment, plaintiff was entitled to rea stipulation for limitation of liability to a specified amount in respect of the baggage.[96] Damages for loss of commissions on sales which might have been made during the time the salesman was deprived of the use of samples are not recoverable, however, where such loss is not caused directly by the default of the carrier and is not such a loss as the parties could have contemplated, or where such loss of commissions is so speculative and dependent on numerous and changing contingencies as not to permit an approximately accurate ascertainment of the character or amount of the damages.[97]

Mental suffering is not ordinarily an element of damages for injury to, or loss of, a passenger's baggage;[98] but physical suffering and mental distress caused by the loss of medicines contained in a hand bag which was stolen may be included as an element of the damages recoverable.[99]

Nominal damages only can be recovered in the absence of proof of the value of the articles destroyed,[1] or where, although the carrier has been technically at fault, its fault has not been such as to make it liable for compensatory damages.[2]

Exemplary damages; penalty statutes. An award of exemplary damages has been upheld in an action in tort involving willful disregard of a passenger's rights in regard to furnishing accommodations and caring for baggage,[3] but, in an action based on alleged refusal to deliver baggage at destination and injury to such baggage, it has been held that negligence, however gross, will not justify an award of exemplary damages unless the carrier is guilty of willfulness, wantonness, or conscious indifference to consequences from which malice may be inferred.[4]

A statute providing that, if a railroad company carelessly or willfully injures, or allows to be injured or lost, any baggage, it shall be liable to the owner in a sum not less than double the amount of the actual damage, is highly penal and applies only to such baggage as in a proper sense is personal baggage.[5] So, also, a statute which requires a railroad company to pay a specified amount in addition to damages for injury to baggage where it has knowingly kept a willful or reckless person in its employment, or has permitted injury to, or destruction of, baggage through failure to provide sufficient help and facilities, is a penal statute and is to be strictly construed.[6]

L. TRANSPORTATION IN PALACE AND SLEEPING CARS

§ 904. Character and Status of Palace and Sleeping Car Companies

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a sleeping car company is neither a common carrier nor an innkeeper; but its status as a public servant and its relation to the public imposes on it certain duties and liabilities in the carriage of passengers and their effects.

As stated in the text of Corpus Juris quoted with approval, palace and sleeping cars are operated in connection with railroad trains, generally

In an action in tort for the invasion of the rights of plaintiff passengers by failure to provide proper seating accommodations in a bus and by taking along plaintiffs' baggage in a bus from which plaintiffs had been excluded and destroying or losing such baggage, an award of three hundred dollars as punitive damages was not, as a matter of law, so excessive as to render the failure of the trial judge to reduce the amount an abuse of discretion.—Payne v. by independent companies that make a business of the ownership and management of such cars, and the status of such a company, except where it is declared by a statutory or constitutional provision to be a common carrier, is not that of a common carrier of goods or of passengers,[7] nor that of an innkeeper,[8] although it bears some marked resemblance to each,[9] and is obviously a public means of transportation.[10] Such a company, however, is a public servant and its relation to the public imposes on it certain duties and liabilities in the carriage of passengers and their effects;[11] and the state may impose on it reasonable regulations for the common good, subject to the constitutional limitations for the protection of rights to life, liberty, and property.[12]

§ 905. Contract Duty in General

A purchaser of sleeping car accommodations can recover for damages sustained for failure to furnish such accommodations, or others equally good, in accordance with the terms of the contract. A ticket received for a berth in a sleeping car is merely a symbol indicating that the passenger is entitled to such accommodations.

The purchaser of sleeping car accommodations in a particular sleeper becomes for the period covered by the contract the owner of a special property right in that sleeper,[13] and is entitled to the accommodations for which he has contracted, and may recover damages if he is not furnished such accommodations,[14] or accommodations equally as good;[15] and the company cannot relieve itself from liability therefor by tendering him back the amount of the charges which have been paid by him,[16] by the fact that the holders of the tickets surrendered them and accepted the price of the tickets in return,[17] or by showing that he demanded the return of his railroad tickets from the railroad conductor.[18] Likewise, the company cannot escape liability on the ground that plaintiff should first have conferred with it and verified the agent's authority,[19] or on the ground that its agent did not understand the legal effect of the reservation.[20]

A carrier can lawfully contract and be bound by its contract to deliver Pullman tickets at a distant place, notwithstanding such delivery is to be performed beyond its lines and by an employee of another carrier;[21] and the person to whom such tickets are to be delivered is in a real sense a party thereto.[22] Such person is not bound by the printed portion of the receipt for the money for the ticket and berth, limiting the carrier's liability, unless known and assented to by the person purchasing the ticket.[23] Also, where the statute so provides, such a contract, where ambiguous or uncertain, is to be construed in favor of the person in whose favor the provision was made.[24]

Duty of passenger. The passenger, on his part, when he engages a berth in a sleeping car, impliedly agrees to conduct himself in a quiet and orderly manner, to take proper care of his berth while it is in his possession, and to give it up at the end of his journey in as good condition as when it was assigned to him, necessary wear excepted.[25]

Effect of ticket. There is a difference between the right of a passenger purchasing an ordinary railroad ticket, and the right which he obtains in buying a sleeping car ticket.[26] Where a passenger buys a right to a berth in a sleeping car, the ticket he receives is not a contract, but merely a symbol indicating to the sleeping car company's agent that the passenger is entitled to accommodations in the car named in the ticket,[27] and it may be varied or contradicted by parol evidence.[28] While, as between the conductor of the sleeping car and the passenger, the passenger's ticket is the sole evidence of the contract,[29] and the conductor is not required to accept the uncorroborated statement of a passenger that he has lost his ticket,[30] if the ticket is incorrect by reason of the fault of the selling agent, the sleeping car company is bound by the contract which was in fact made and cannot shield itself from liability for nonperformance of the actual contract on the ground that it had made a regulation which precluded its conductors from making any inquiry as to the real contract or from carrying it out.[31]

"There is no question involved of the right of the sleeping car company to require the purchase and exhibition of tickets and to promulgate and enforce rules with respect to the operation of its cars. This does not, however, absolve the company from liability for negligence of its servants in refusing to furnish accommodations in accordance with tickets purchased by patrons, and the company was not absolved from liability, in this instance, by the fact that the holders of the tickets surrendered them and accepted the price of the tickets in return. This is true for the reason that appellee had then been deprived of the use of the tickets by the refusal of the conductor to admit them to the car. In other words, it was not a voluntary surrender of the tickets in the sense that there was a cancellation or rescission of the contract, the terms of which had already been broken by the company's servant in refusing to admit the passengers into the car. All the passengers could do then was to surrender the tickets and accept return of the money, and the acceptance of the money did not waive the wrong or negligence of the servant in failing to comply with the contract."—Pullman Co. v. § 906. Duty as to Transportation

A sleeping car company does not undertake the duty of transporting passengers to their destination.

A sleeping car company, by furnishing cars under a contract with a railroad company to be used as sleeping cars by the traveling public, does not undertake the duty of transporting the passengers to their destination;[32] but the obligation which devolves on it by the sale of a ticket is to grant the purchaser the privilege of riding in its car and of using the additional comforts and conveniences which it furnishes.[33] It does, however, oblige itself to have throughout the entire line, as indicated on its tickets, suitable cars to allow an uninterrupted transit, to have provided such connections between the railroads intervening between the termini and over the route indicated on the tickets as, according to the regular trains running on such roads, will permit a continuous transit, and to see that these roads are so situated, manned, and operated as, according to their regularly established trains, to admit of a continuous passage over the route specified in the tickets;[34] and, where all these obligations are fulfilled, the sleeping car company cannot be held liable for the failure or refusal of the railroad company to perform its contract for the transportation of the passenger.[35]

§ 907. Duty to Receive Passengers

A sleeping car company is obliged to furnish accommodation, if it has a vacant berth at its disposal, to all passengers to whom no personal objection attaches. Statutes requiring separate accommodations for colored persons apply to sleeping car companies.

As in the case of carriers of passengers, one of the duties which a sleeping car company owes to the public is that of treating with fairness and without unjust discrimination all persons whose patronage is solicited; and when, therefore, a passenger who, under the rules of the company, is entitled to a berth on the payment of the usual fare, and to whom no personal objection attaches, enters the company's car at a proper time for the purpose of procuring accommodation, and applies in a proper manner for a berth, tendering the customary price therefor, the company is obliged to furnish the accommodation, provided it has a vacant berth at its disposal; and a refusal, without good excuse, to furnish accommodations to an unobjectionable person, on the usual and reasonable terms, is a breach of legal duty.[36] A sleeping car company's liability to persons seeking its accommodations rests solely on the breach of its implied obligation to furnish such accommodations as it holds itself out as offering to the public.[37] The company, however, cannot be held liable for refusing to furnish a berth, when so requested, where the only vacant berth is in a section which has been sold previously, even though the section has been sold to one person who occupies only one part thereof; nor can it be held liable for the refusal of its agent to sell a section, occupied at the time, from the point of the occupant's destination before that point has been reached.[38]

The right of a person to a berth or passage on a sleeping car, even though all the accommodations have not been taken, is not unlimited, but is subject to such reasonable regulations as the company may prescribe.[39] The company may, under a reasonable regulation, refuse to receive as a passenger one who is afflicted with a contagious or infectious disease, or one who is insane; and, if such person has already purchased a ticket, it is bound, as a condition to the rescission of the contract, to offer to return the purchase price of the ticket.[40]

Discrimination on account of color. Statutory provisions requiring separate accommodations for colored persons have been held to apply to sleeping cars.[41] Where a sleeping car company has contracted to furnish accommodations to a negro, it cannot defend an action for the breach of its contract on the ground that in the course of the journey the car entered a state where the transportation of negroes in the same car with white passengers was illegal, as in such case the contract of the passenger was not that he should be carried in the same car with white persons in violation of law, but he had the right to assume that if such contingency arose he would be furnished with a berth in a coach or apartment of equal comfort and convenience separate from the white passengers.[42]

Husband and wife in same berth. Where a berth is contracted for by the husband, with the express understanding that it is engaged for the joint occupancy of himself and wife, or under circumstances which are not misleading within themselves, the refusal to permit such a joint occupancy without other reason than the difference of sex, and where such a refusal would amount to a breach of contract, gives to the injured party a right of action for damages; but, where the husband and wife individually contract for a berth, the company is not liable for a refusal to permit them to occupy the same berth.[43]

§ 908. Extra Fare and Ticket

The payment to the railroad of an extra fare for first-class passage, although this may be a prerequisite to the right to ride in a sleeping car, does not entitle the passenger to parlor or sleeping car accommodations without the payment of additional compensation to the sleeping car company. A sleeping car company may require those seeking its accommodations to purchase a ticket.

If a railroad company furnishes a sufficient number of first-class cars with the usual appliances and service for the accommodation of persons entitled to first-class passage, the payment of a first-class fare does not entitle a passenger to demand carriage in a parlor car in the train furnished with additional conveniences and service; and for such additional service and accommodations the company may lawfully demand a reasonable extra compensation from those passengers who from choice avail themselves thereof;[44] and it has this right notwithstanding the amount which the company may charge for a first-class passage is fixed by statute.[45] In case a passenger cannot obtain a seat in an ordinary car, he may pass into the drawing-room car without first asking the railroad conductor for a seat, and may recover for injuries received by reason of the attempt of the drawing-room car employee to eject him.[46]

Right to require ticket. A sleeping car company may lawfully require those seeking to be carried to purchase tickets, when convenient facilities therefor are afforded, to exhibit them to persons designated by it for that purpose,[47] and to surrender them, after securing their berths in the car, when required by the person in immediate charge;[48] and, if the passenger loses his ticket, he may be refused the accommodations for which he has paid,[49] although it has been held, as hereinafter stated in § 913, that he may not be ejected because of the loss of his ticket.

Necessity of railroad ticket. Where by a contract between the sleeping car company and the railroad company the latter company determines what passengers shall be entitled to occupy the sleeping cars, the sleeping car company is not liable for a refusal to furnish a berth to a passenger who, under the rules of the railroad company, is not authorized to use the sleeping car, such as for a refusal in accordance with the terms of its agreement with the railroad company to furnish sleeping car accommodations to one not holding a first-class railroad ticket,[50] or to one not holding a ticket for transportation for the whole route.[51] It is immaterial in this connection that the agent refusing to sell the berth was the agent of the sleeping car company as well as of the railroad company, as, in refusing such accommodation, he is acting as the agent of the railroad company, and not of the sleeping car company.[52]

§ 909. Safety and Comfort of Passengers

A sleeping car company is required to exercise a high degree of care for the personal safety and comfort of its passengers.

A sleeping car company, by its invitation to passengers to occupy its cars, holds itself out to the world as furnishing safe and comfortable cars, and, when it sells a ticket, there is an implied stipulation that its cars may be occupied with reasonable safety and comfort as sleeping cars.[53] A sleeping car company is required to exercise a high degree of care for the personal safety and comfort of its passengers,[54] but, although there is authority to the contrary,[55] it is not held to that highest degree of care which attaches to a common carrier.[56] The acts of the conductor and the porter of a sleeping car with reference to the safety of the passenger are within the scope of their employment so as to render the company liable for their negligence or misconduct.[57] The sleeping car company, however, is not an insurer of the safety of its passengers, and, in order for it to be liable for injuries to its passengers, it must appear that the injury was a direct result of some neglect of duty on its part,[58] but the fact that the railroad company was also concurrently negligent with the sleeping car company does not relieve such company of liability for its negligent acts if they contributed directly to the passenger's injury.[59] Accordingly the passenger cannot complain of inconvenience or discomfort which is incidental to the operation of the car.[60]

A passenger on a sleeping car has the right to ex-

Protection from humiliation

"When a person having a ticket which entitles him to a ride on a railroad train presents such railroad ticket for the inspection of an agent, who is authorized by the Pullman Company to sell Pullman car accommodation, and, after inspection of the railroad ticket, the Pullman agent sells to the intending passenger a seat or berth in the Pullman car, entitling the purchaser to Pullman privileges and service, a contract arises from the payment of the passenger for the Pullman accommodations that the Pullman Company will use all the care and diligence required of passengers to see to it that the passenger is afforded the full enjoyment of the Pullman privileges, the use of his seat or berth, rest if he desires, and other conveniences and comforts of the Pullman service, including protection, as far as the Pullman Company can give it, from acts or conduct likely to subject the passenger to humiliation, indignity or embarrassment."—Bonner v. Compelling passenger to change cars

Where sleeping car passenger was aroused by sleeping car employee and compelled to leave the car in which he was sleeping and directed to another car not heated, in which he was refused a berth, and compelled to sit in clothing which had become wet by exposure to rain during the transfer, the sleeping car company was liable therefor, and could not defend by showing that the railway company had told it to make the transfer.—Pullman Co. v. McGowan, Tex.Civ.App., 210 S.W. 842, error refused.

Ejection of passenger see infra § 913

Lack of control of trains immaterial

The duty arising from the relation of carrier and passenger between a sleeping car company and its passenger to use proper care in transferring the passenger from one sleeper to another is not affected by the fact that the company does not control the trains to which its coaches are attached.—Pullman Co. v. McGowan, Tex.Civ.App., 210 S.W. 842, error refused.

58. Md.—Griffith v. Pullman Co., 121 A. 362, 142 Md. 514.

Closing door on hand

A passenger cannot complain of the closing of a door so as to injure his hand, where the porter closing it had no knowledge that the passenger's hand was in a dangerous position.—Wilkins v. Pullman Co., C.C.Pa., 166 F. 1004.

Gate open at end of car

Negligence of Pullman company and railway company in not seeing that gate of tourist car was closed was the concurrent proximate cause of injury to passenger stepping from tourist car to baggage car as train was cut between them at station.—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Packard, Tex.Civ.App., 193 S.W. 397, error refused.

Ice on sill of car

Railroad and Pullman company were required to exercise only reasonable care for safety of passenger in acquiring knowledge of ice on sill of car, and, if ice could not be seen by reasonable inspection, they were not liable for fall.—Connell v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 168 P. 337, 51 Utah 20.

Inability to open door

Any negligence of the porter of a Pullman car, placed on a siding in a city to await the next train, in temporarily going away, leaving a woman passenger alone, was not the proximate cause of any injury to her from fright on being unable, with the single effort made, to open the door, although it could be opened by turning the knob and applying a twelve-pound pull; as it could not be anticipated that she could not open it, and that, if she could not, such result would follow.—Pullman Co. v. Gutierez, Tex.Civ.App., 198 S.W. 1065, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Injury from sneezing

Injury to passenger's back by sneezing, or attempting to suppress sneezing, because she had to travel in drafty chair car without heat operated by railroad company, cannot be said to be proximate and natural result of breach by defendant Pullman company of contract to furnish berth, "proximate cause" being the active efficient cause which sets in motion a train of events that in their natural sequence might and ought to be expected to produce an injury as undisturbed by any independent intervening cause.—O'Neil v. Pullman Co., 260 S.W. 798, 214 Mo.App. 283.

pect those conveniences which are ordinarily furnished in such cars, and for which he has paid,[61] and there is an implied agreement on the part of the company that it will keep and furnish such supplies and conveniences as are usual and necessary to the health and comfort of the passengers.[62]

It is the duty of a sleeping car company, or of a railroad company if it furnishes the sleeping car, to give a passenger reasonably safe means for getting into and out of a berth,[63] to furnish proper attendance,[64] to furnish lights and to use reasonable diligence to maintain them in the toilet room and other parts of the car which are subject to use by the passengers at various times,[65] and to keep the aisle of the car free from obstruction and open to the use of the passengers, and the passengers may assume that they can safely pass through the car.[66] Where a sleeping car company accepts as a passenger a sick person on the way to a hospital, it is the duty of the employees of such company to see that the passenger is properly taken from the car to the depot at her destination; and this duty is not waived by the fact that the conductor telegraphed for an ambulance and to plaintiff's friends to meet her, since in so doing the conductor acted as the passenger's agent.[67]

Baggage in aisle. If a passenger places his personal baggage in the aisle of a car, and so obstructs the passageway, the sleeping car company is not chargeable with negligence unless it is shown that it had actual or constructive notice of the presence of the baggage in the aisle.[68] Where, however, the sleeping car company has such notice, it is liable if a passenger, while exercising reasonable care, is injured thereby.[69]

Duty to prepare berth. While it is the company's duty to have the passenger's berth made up and ready for his occupancy at the proper time,[70] the passenger cannot recover damages merely because the company's employee failed to comply immediately with the request for the preparation of his berth.[71]

Duty to notify and to awaken passenger. It is the duty of a sleeping car company to notify a passenger on its car of the train's arrival at his destination,[72] and to awaken the occupant of a berth in reasonable time for him to dress safely and comfortably and to leave the train at the point of his destination,[73] and a failure to perform such duties constitutes negligence.[74]

No negligence

Where the ladder used to ascend to an upper berth was not shown to be out of repair or broken, and where it is shown that others used the same ladder in safety, the fact that plaintiff fell from the ladder in ascending to her berth does not show negligence on the part of the sleeping car company.—Griffith v. Constructive notice

Whether a sleeping car company had constructive notice of such an obstruction depends on the length of time the bag had been in the aisle. If it had been there so long that defendant's employees would have discovered it if they had been reasonably vigilant in the discharge of their duties, defendant should be held to have had constructive notice. Where, however, the evidence wholly fails to show when the bag was put in the aisle, there is nothing on which to base a finding of constructive notice.—Spallen v. § 910. Protection of Passenger in General

A sleeping car company must take reasonable precautions for the protection of its passengers, particularly during the sleeping hours.

A sleeping car company also has the duty of exercising a reasonable watch over the safety of its sleeping passengers, and of using all proper means within its power to preserve order in its cars during the journey, especially during the sleeping hours, and to permit the passengers peaceably to occupy the berths without any interference with their proper use and enjoyment;[75] and, if injuries arise through the failure of its employees in charge of the cars to exercise due care for the protection and comfort of persons using them in accordance with the regulation of the company, the company is liable.[76] A sleeping car company is not liable to a passenger for injuries which it had no reason to foresee,[77] but this does not mean that it is under no duty to maintain a watch over its sleeping passengers until a reasonable apprehension of danger arises.[78]

§ 911. Assaults and Insults by Employees

A sleeping car company is liable to its passengers for assaults committed on them by its employees; but not for wanton assaults entirely disconnected with their employment or which are induced by the passenger.

A sleeping car company is liable, like a carrier of passengers, for wrongful insults,[79] and for an assault on a passenger by an employee, such as a ticket agent,[80] or the porter,[81] but not for a wanton assault committed by the employee outside of the scope of his employment and the functions committed to him;[82] nor is the company liable for an assault by its employee, which was provoked by the wrongful conduct of the passenger.[83]

Rudeness of employees. It is the duty of a sleeping car company to investigate matters apparently showing improper conduct by passengers. Such investigation should be conducted without rudeness or greater publicity than necessary; but mere rudeness of manner in discharging the duty, not accompanied by violence, will not of itself be a cause of action, although it may be considered in aggravation of damages if a cause of action otherwise exists.[84]

Person lawfully on car, but not a passenger. The liability of a sleeping car company for injuries to a person not a passenger, but lawfully on the car, caused by the wanton and unprovoked assault by its employee, is not governed by the principles regulating the liability of common carriers, under the contract of carriage, for like assaults committed by their employees on passengers; but the obligation in such a case is independent of any contractual relation and is governed by the general principles of the law of master and servant, the company being liable as any other master for an injury caused by its employee in the course of his employment.[85]

§ 912. Assaults by Third Persons

A sleeping car company is liable for a failure to use due care to protect a passenger from insult or injury from a third person.

A sleeping car company, and also the railroad company, are liable for a failure to use due care to protect a passenger from insult or injury from third persons.[86] The company, however, cannot be held

Failure to answer call bell

Where passenger on Pullman car indicated that he intended to assault woman passenger in her berth, who rang bell for porter and conductor, and they failed to respond, whereupon assault was committed, Pullman company was not liable, unless it or the porter had reasonable ground to believe violence was imminent, as the failure to answer the call bell is not the natural or probable cause of the injury.—Hall v. liable for injuries received by a passenger at the hands of an intruder, a stranger, or a fellow passenger, where its employees neither knew, nor in the light of surrounding circumstances were bound to know, that the danger threatened was to be apprehended, and failed to use their authority and power to protect the passenger therefrom;[87] nor does the company's duty to exercise reasonable care to protect passengers require it or its employees to prevent the arrest and removal of a passenger.[88]

§ 913. Ejection of Passengers

A sleeping car company may, if it uses no more force than is reasonably necessary, evict a passenger from the accommodations of its cars for a sufficient cause. It is liable, however, for wrongful eviction.

A palace or sleeping car company, like a railroad company, has a right to eject a passenger from the accommodations of its cars, for a sufficient cause,[89] provided it uses no more force than is reasonably necessary and acts in a considerate manner,[90] using ordinary care for such person's safety.[91] Thus a passenger may be ejected for refusing to pay the regular extra charge demanded for the accommodations in such a car,[92] or for failing to procure a proper railroad ticket,[93] or for insisting on bringing improper articles into the car.[94] Where, however, the ejection is made without a sufficient cause, or is otherwise wrongful, the company is liable for the injury resulting therefrom.[95]

A sleeping car company cannot be held liable for the ejection of a passenger from its car by the officers or agents of the railroad company where its own employees had nothing to do with such ejection.[96] It has also been held that the ejection of a passenger traveling on a second-class ticket from a sleeping car in accordance with the rules of the railroad company is the act of the railroad company and not of the sleeping car company, even though the conductor and the porter of the sleeping car assisted the employees of the railroad company in the ejection.[97]

Loss of ticket. Where the proof is clear and satisfactory that the passenger has bought his ticket, but has lost it, and the ticket is limited to a particular berth and trip, and the circumstances are such that it is reasonably certain that the company cannot be defrauded by the ticket being in the hands of another, the passenger should be allowed to have the berth,[98] and the company is liable for the act

Conspiracy with porter

Where the porter of a Pullman car conspired and colluded with a passenger in the latter's making of an assault on another passenger while in her berth, the Pullman company was liable to the assaulted passenger.—Hall v. Pullman Co., D.C.Fla., 253 F. 297.

Robbery with violence

Where a woman was assaulted by a negro, who tried to grab her pocketbook and dragged her and her six-year-old daughter across two tracks and a platform as she was about to board a sleeping car, the conductor, who was helping them into the car, entirely failing to protect them from assault and robbery, as he might have done, the Pullman company was liable, since it must guard passengers from the attacks of wrongdoers, if such attacks can be foreseen, and must protect them from annoyance and insult, not only from its own servants, but from all others.—Garrett v. Southern Ry. Co., 90 S.E. 903, 172 N.C. 737, L.R.A.1917F 885—10 C.J. p. 1173 note 30 [a].

Intoxicated passenger

Carrier operating sleeping car was liable for damages, caused when drunken male passenger in a nude or partially nude condition fell or climbed into the berth of a female passenger, only if it knew, or in the exercise of reasonable care could have ascertained, the intoxicated condition of such passenger, and in the exercise of ordinary care could have anticipated that he would probably insult or injure the female passenger.—Tomme v. Same as if ejected from train

"Conceding that she had no right to ride in the Pullman car without paying or tendering the extra fare required, and that she could be required to remove from that car into another upon her refusal to pay the fare, there is no doubt but that she entered the coach by mistake, and the servants of the railroad, in removing her from the coach, were required to use ordinary care for her safety, as to the time and place and manner of her removal, and, if there was failure to exercise such care, it was negligent. When she was commanded to leave the coach and go into another, it was an expulsion of her from the coach, and the same rule, it seems, should apply to the care required to be exercised in regard to her safety as if she were to be ejected from a train."—Louisville & N. of the conductor in compelling him to leave the car.[99]

What constitutes ejection. Any acts of the company's employees which oust a passenger from the accommodations to which he is entitled, or which prevent him from entering the car and enjoying such accommodations, constitute an ejection,[1] and this rule applies where a passenger leaves the car under protest, on the orders of the employee in charge,[2] or in order to avoid being transported to a place other than his destination,[3] but not where he leaves voluntarily.[4]

§ 914. Duties and Liabilities as to Passenger's Effects

While a sleeping car company is not an insurer of the safety of a passenger's effects, it is under a duty to maintain a reasonable watch, particularly during the sleeping hours, for the protection of its passenger's property, and is liable for a failure to do so. The company is liable for a loss of such property through theft by its employees.

Since, as stated supra § 904, a sleeping car company is considered to be neither a common carrier nor an innkeeper, it is generally held that a sleeping car company does not assume the exceptional liability for goods which the law imposes on common carriers of goods or innkeepers by reason of engaging in those public callings;[5] but the measure of its duty and liability must be determined from the nature of its specific and implied engagements with its patrons.[6] A sleeping car company is not an insurer of the safety of a passenger's property, luggage, and effects, but is liable only for injuries or loss due to its negligence,[7] and it has been held that the passenger must take ordinary care for the protection and safety of his property.[8] Accordingly, as hereinafter shown in § 919 c, mere proof of loss of luggage which is taken by the passenger into a sleeping car does not as a rule make out either an absolute or a prima facie case of liability against the company; but, where the company through its employees takes the passenger's property into its custody and control, a loss thereof may be sufficient to hold the company liable,[9] as, under such circumstances, the company is a bailee of the property and under a duty to return it or account for its failure to do so.[10]

Ordinary care required

Sleeping car companies are required to use only reasonable or ordinary care to guard the property of passengers from theft, and are not held to that high degree of care applicable to common carriers generally.—Pullman Co. v. Moise, Tex.Civ.App., 187 S.W. 249.

In Nebraska, however, it has been stated that "A sleeping-car company, so far as it renders service similar in kind to an innkeeper, is subject to the same liabilities; and where an article of wearing apparel belonging to a passenger in one of such cars has been placed in the care of the porter, and is stolen from the car, the company will be liable therefor."—Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Conversion

Carrier was not liable in conversion for loss of passenger's valuables placed in berth over her own.—Pinkus v. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 114 N.E. 36, 63 Ind.App 38.

Loss not foreseeable

Where a passenger, who was having his hand bag carried by a station porter, was detained outside a Pullman car for the purpose of having his ticket examined, and when he entered the car, in which the porter was supposed to have left his bag, it could not be found, the carrier cannot be held liable on the theory that the loss would not have happened, if he had been allowed access to the car at the same time with the porter, for the requirement was reasonable and the loss could not have been foreseen.—Sneddon v. Payne, 187 N.Y.S. 185, 114 Misc. 537.

Loss during daytime

Pullman company is not liable for negligence in daytime unless property has been bailed with company, so that company, through its servants, has custody of property or has guaranteed to exercise watch over property.—Barnet v. Pullman Co., 281 N.Y.S. 575, 155 Misc. 876.

10 C.J. p 1175 note 52.

Authority of porter

In so far as liability for loss of baggage is concerned, a Pullman porter acts within the scope of his employment in assisting boarding passengers with their baggage. The mere fact that the passenger tipped the porter does not make him his agent.—Van Dike v. Pullman Co., 261 N.Y.S. 292, 145 Misc. 452.

10. N.Y.—Reisinger v. Pullman Co., 238 N.Y.S. 228, 248 App.Div 171, reargument denied and order resettled 292 N.Y.S. 381.

Notwithstanding the fact that a palace or sleeping car company is not subject to the extraordinary liability of a common carrier or an innkeeper, it is required to exercise a reasonable degree of care to guard the baggage and effects of a passenger from loss or injury, and if through want of such care the baggage or personal effects of a passenger such as he might reasonably carry with him are stolen or injured, the company is liable[11] What is a reasonable degree of care must be measured with reference to the danger of theft or injury reasonably to be apprehended under the circumstances,[12] and such a degree of care the passenger is entitled to expect.[13]

As the contract for the use of a berth involves an implied invitation to a passenger to sleep, it is the duty of the company to maintain a reasonable watch over his property while he is so using the berth.[14] A higher degree of care may be required during the night while the passenger is sleeping than is required in the day when the passenger is charged with the duty of exercising reasonable diligence for the protection of his property;[15] but, if the passenger is asleep during the daytime, it has been held that the common usages of travel permit no distinction to be made between a loss while a passenger happens to be asleep during any particular hour of the night and a loss while he is asleep during the daytime[16] To fulfill this duty the company is required to maintain a careful and continuous watch in the interior of the car while the berths are occupied by sleepers,[17] and if there is a failure to discharge this duty by not providing competent and efficient employees,[18] or by imposing on them duties which make it impracticable for them to furnish adequate protection,[19] the sleeping car company is liable for any loss which may reasonably be attributable to negligence in this respect.

Baggage in custody of passenger. The mere fact that a passenger retains control and custody of his baggage does not relieve the company from liability for its loss, as the company is still in such relation to the passenger's property as to owe to him the exercise of reasonable care and vigilance, in the management of its car, to prevent possible theft.[20]

Baggage left in car. While the company's liability does not end until after the passenger has safely reached his destination with all of his effects,[21] when a passenger leaves the car at his destination, the company is entitled to suppose that he has taken with him his baggage and property, and, until the property is discovered by its agents to have been left, the company is charged with no duty concerning it.[22] It has been held, however, that the company should exercise ordinary care in looking out for, and taking care of, property casually left in the car, and in restoring it to the owner.[23]

Bailee

Pullman company, in assuming control and possession of boarding passenger's bag through porter became bailee thereof—Van Dike v. Pullman Co., 261 N Y S. 292, 145 Misc. 452

Duty to restore

Where the Pullman company assumed duty to take care of passenger's baggage, it was part of its duty and its porter's to restore such baggage to passenger in the morning, the porter having placed it in the upper berth of the passenger's section, or to account for it—Palmer v. Sufficiency of watch. Where the doors in a car are left open and unguarded, thus giving access to unauthorized persons, or where the officers charged with the superintendence leave the car without that supervision by them on which the passenger has a right to rely, such negligence is shown as will render the company liable for a loss;[24] and it has been held that the company will be liable for a loss occasioned by theft during a relaxation of the watch, even though the relaxation is only for a few moments.[25] It is not required, however, that a watch shall be kept over the only open entrance of a moving train, or that the windows also shall be specially guarded.[26]

The company can be made responsible for the loss of baggage or property of a passenger only by its neglect to keep that reasonable guard which its contract with the passenger implies;[27] and if a proper watch is kept, and there is no proof connecting the watchman with the theft, the company cannot be held liable for a loss.[28]

Theft by employee. Without reference to the law regulating the liability of a sleeping car company for the loss of a passenger's property through its negligence, the company is liable for a loss of such property through theft by its employee,[29] unless the money or property stolen is not such as the passenger is entitled to take in the car with him as baggage.[30]

While passenger absent from berth. This duty does not terminate with the period during which the passenger is actually asleep, but extends to keeping a reasonable watch over such of his necessary baggage and belongings as he cannot conveniently take with him, or watch himself, while he is absent from his berth,[31] such as when preparing his toilet after rising,[32] or while he is using the necessary conveniences of the car,[33] or is walking up and down the aisle,[34] or is absent from the car at a meal station.[35]

§ 915. Property for Which Liable

A sleeping car company may be held liable for the loss of only such money, baggage, or other personal belongings as are reasonably necessary for a passenger to take on a journey.

The rule as to what luggage and effects the sleeping car company may become liable for, by reason of their being taken into its car by a passenger, is the same as that with reference to the liability of carriers in general for baggage with the possession of which the passenger does not actually part.[36] Thus, a sleeping car company is liable for the loss of only such money, baggage, or other personal belongings as are reasonably necessary for a passenger to take on a journey.[37] This includes clothing, ornaments, and such articles as are usually carried by travelers, together with a sum of money reasonably sufficient for the expenses of the journey in which the passenger is engaged.[38] In determining

If a porter steals a passenger's diamond left under his pillow, the carrier, in contemplation of law, is guilty of negligence, and liable for its value.—Pullman Co. v. Bullock, Tex.Civ.App., 231 S.W. 1112.

Duty to employ trustworthy employees

It is the duty of a sleeping car company to employ competent and trustworthy employees and to exercise a high degree of care in protecting its passengers and their property, and if a sum of money reasonable to be carried, in view of the journey, is taken from a pillow by the porter in absence of the passenger, and while he is making up the berth, it is done in the course of the employment of the porter and the company is liable.—Pullman Co. v. Camera

Where the Pullman company's porter took charge of a passenger's baggage and put it into the upper berth of the passenger's section, but could not produce a camera in the morning when called on therefor, the compa-

what amount of money or what effects are reasonably necessary for a passenger to take on a journey, regard must be had to his station in life, to the length, purpose, and probable duration of the journey,[39] and to the probable emergencies that may be expected to arise in the course of such journey,[40] and may include articles intended for his use after he leaves the car.[41] As to any excess of baggage or property beyond this, the company not having agreed to become a carrier in regard thereto, and having received no compensation for such a responsibility, and no notice from the passenger that such a duty was expected of it, is not liable for a loss or theft, even in case the theft is by its own employees.[42] It has been held, however, that this rule does not apply to funds left in the passenger's baggage, where the company's servant took personal possession of the effects, and where it is found as a fact that the porter purloined the property.[43]

A reasonable amount of jewelry and ornaments, according to the condition and circumstances in life of a passenger, may be carried as baggage,[44] but no jewels and ornaments carried for transportation merely, without any intention or purpose of using them on the journey, such as pocket jewels and ornaments wholly disconnected with the passenger's personal attire.[45]

Property of person not a passenger. A sleeping car company is not liable for loss of, or injury to, property belonging to a person not a passenger, even though it was in luggage of a passenger which was destroyed through its negligence, at least where such property was not intended to be for the use of the passenger.[46]

§ 916. Limitation of Liability

A sleeping car company cannot limit its liability for negligence.

Contracts of a sleeping car company for limitation of liability in case of negligence are invalid.[47] As the liability of the sleeping car company is for negligence only, such liability cannot be restricted by stipulations printed on the check given to the passenger,[48] nor by a rule posted in the car, especially where this rule is not brought to the attention of the passenger;[49] nor can any rule or stipulation to the contrary, if it is not known to the passenger, avail the company;[50] and it will not be presumed that the laws of a foreign state permitted the company to contract against liability for losses incurred by its own negligence.[51]

§ 917. Contributory Negligence

Except where the loss is caused by theft by the company's employee, negligence on the part of a passenger directly contributing to his loss or injury will defeat his right to recover therefor from a sleeping car company.

Contributory negligence of the passenger will defeat recovery for injuries received, where such contributory negligence, rather than the fault of the company, occasions the injury.[52] A passenger, however, on a sleeping car is only under a duty to act as the average person might have acted, and he is not required to take every precaution which he could have to prevent the accident.[53] Accordingly, a passenger who leaves his berth at night to go to the toilet room, after he has discovered that one of the night lights at the end of the aisle is out, is not contributorily negligent as a matter of law[54]

54. Minn.—Spallen v. Pullman Co., 186 N.W 233, 151 Minn 152.

As to passenger's property. Where a passenger in a palace or sleeping car is guilty of negligence which contributes to the loss of or injury to his property, he cannot recover therefor,[55] as where the passenger while awake exposes to theft money or similar personal belongings which are in his exclusive custody, and leaves them, without notice to the employees of the company.[56] The passenger, however, will not be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence where he acted reasonably under the circumstances.[57] The mere fact that he failed to deposit his property in the safest place in the berth,[58] or utilized a receptacle in his berth, placed therein by the company for the use and convenience of an occupant,[59] does not preclude a recovery from the company for its negligence in permitting a theft thereof, as the company is bound to take reasonable care to prevent theft of the passenger's property, without regard to the part of the berth in which it is placed. Where the acts of alleged negligence on the part of the passenger were caused by the wrongful conduct of the company itself, the latter is estopped from claiming immunity because of such acts.[60] Where an alighting passenger intrusts his baggage to the care of the porter, he is justified in believing that the porter will take care of it until such time as he claims it.[61]

Theft by employee. For the theft of the necessary baggage or money of a traveler by one of its employees the company is liable, even though the traveler has been negligent in exposing the baggage or property in such a way as to induce the theft. In such a case the contributory negligence of the traveler cannot be considered the proximate cause of the loss, as it is the duty of the company, through its employees, to protect a passenger's property, even though it is exposed to theft by him.[62]

§ 918. Respective Duties and Liabilities of Railroad Company and Palace or Sleeping Car Company

The railroad and sleeping car companies are jointly and severally liable for injuries caused by the negligence of either of them to passengers or their effects, except that the railroad company is not liable for injuries due to the negligence of sleeping car employees with respect to their duties which arise peculiarly out of the contract to furnish sleeping car accommodations, and that the sleeping car company is not liable for negligent acts of the railroad company in regard to transportation.

The fact that a passenger rides on a palace or sleeping car attached to a train, under a contract with the palace or sleeping car company owning such car, does not relieve the railroad company from its ordinary obligations and duties to such passengers;[63] but in such cases, in all matters relating to the safe and comfortable transportation of the passengers, the conductor, the porter, and other employees on such cars are regarded as the employees of the railroad company, for whose carelessness or negligence in causing injuries to passengers thereon it is liable;[64] and this rule has been held to apply where a sleeping car is standing ready to receive passengers of the railroad company, although it is not attached to a train.[65] A railroad company drawing sleeping cars may also be held liable for defects in the sleeping car, especially where the passenger is not aware that it is under the management of the sleeping car company.[66] The fact that the railroad company may also be liable as a common carrier does not relieve the sleeping car company from any duty it may have assumed or been charged with by reason of its joining the railroad in the carriage of the passenger.[67] If the railroad company imposes and the sleeping car company undertakes to perform any duty which contributes to the safety of passengers while in transit, the passengers are entitled to the performance thereof by the sleeping car company, and, if it fails to perform that duty, it is negligent, and liable to its passengers for injuries resulting therefrom.[68] Both the railroad company and the sleeping car company are jointly and severally liable for injuries caused to passengers on a sleeping car, though the negligence or wrongs of the sleeping car company's employees with respect to the passenger's transportation;[69] and the sleeping car company is not relieved from liability by the fact that its employees acted under orders from the train conductor.[70]

On the other hand, a railroad company is not liable for injuries due to the carelessness or negligence of the sleeping car company's employees with respect to duties which arise peculiarly out of the contract of the sleeping car company to furnish sleeping car accommodations, as distinguished from the railroad company's contract of safe and comfortable transportation.[71] Likewise, the sleeping car company, not having undertaken the general duty of transporting the passenger, is not liable for the wrongful acts or negligence of the employees of the railroad company with respect to such transportation, as where the injury results from the negligent operation of the train, as this is a duty peculiarly assumed by the railroad company.[72] Also, a railroad company is not liable for an assault and battery committed by an employee of a sleeping car company, wholly provoked by the person assaulted.[73]

As to trespassers. The law will not impute to the employees of the sleeping car company an agency for the railroad company as respects trespassers, as the reasons which justify the imputation of an agency or servanthood with respect to passengers wholly fail when applied to a trespasser.[74]

As to baggage. It has been held that a railroad company is liable for the loss of the luggage and effects of a passenger in a sleeping car, under the control of the employees of the sleeping car company,[75] although the contract between the railroad company and the sleeping car company exempts it from liability for baggage,[76] it being held that the liability of the two companies is both joint and several.[77] The railroad is, of course, liable where the loss is due to its own negligence.[78]

§ 919. Actions

a. In general
b. Pleading
c. Evidence
d. Trial

a. In General

General rules apply in actions arising out of the use and operation of sleeping cars.

General rules apply to actions for damages arising from the use and operation of sleeping cars. Accordingly, there must not be a misjoinder of causes of action.[79] Although the passenger may have a right of action on contract for breach of the express or implied undertaking of the sleeping car company to furnish accommodations, the refusal of the company without valid excuse to permit a proper person to avail himself of the accommodations of the sleeping car will support an action in tort.[80]

Venue. An action for damages for failure to provide a sleeping car berth reserved by plaintiff is properly brought in the county where the journey commenced, even though it terminated at a point without the state.[81]

What law governs. A sleeping car passenger's action for abuse and damages caused by the company's employee is governed by the laws of the state in which such acts were done.[82]

Safe place to alight

A sleeping car company is not liable for injury suffered by plaintiff because she was not afforded a safe place to alight, and because of her having to walk back to the station, from the place of her disembarking, over a rough and dangerous railroad track.—Pullman Co. v. Strang, 132 So. 399, 35 Ga.App. 59.

"Reasons which justify the imputation of an agency or servanthood in respect of passengers wholly fail when applied to a trespasser. The railway company owes to its passengers the duty of highest care . . . while to a trespasser it owes only the duty to refrain from intentionally injuring him. . . . Having assumed a contract of carriage with a passenger, it cannot escape or evade its responsibility to him by turning him over to the employés of the Pullman Company. The law forbids it, and makes its veto perfect by treating the employés of the sleeping car company as the servants of the railway company, as respects such passengers. As to trespassers there is no contract and no duty of service, and public policy does not require the imputation of an agency."—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Marlin, 186 S.W. 595, 598, 135 Tenn. 435, L.R.A.1917A 417.

Malicious acts

Where a Pullman car conductor unnecessarily and maliciously, and as a personal matter, compelled a trespasser to leave the train while it was passing over a trestle, and the trespasser was killed, the railroad company was not responsible, the Pullman conductor not being the company's agent as to such act—Louisville & N. 79. Connecting railroads

A petition brought against three defendants jointly, a railroad company, the Pullman company, and another railroad, in which it is alleged that the first two defendants were negligent in permitting plaintiff to remain in the Pullman coach after it had been switched off from the line of the first carrier to the line of the other carrier, thereby diverting plaintiff from the proper route of her destination, and that the conductor of the last named carrier treated her "in a rude and ugly manner" in connection with her leaving the second train, presents a misjoinder of actions, in that it fails to set forth any acts of concurrent negligence contributing to the alleged injury.—Armstrong v. Southern Ry. Co, 116 S.E. 31, 29 Ga.App. 418.

b. Pleading

General rules of pleading apply in actions of this character.

The rules applicable to the pleadings in civil actions generally apply in an action by a passenger against a sleeping car company for a breach of contract,[83] or for injuries to,[84] or ejection of,[85] a passenger, or for loss of, or injury to, the passenger's effects.[86] Contributory negligence in order to be available as a defense must be pleaded.[87]

Issues, proof, and variance. Such matters only can be considered as are properly put in issue by the pleadings and evidence in the case.[88] Plaintiff must recover, if at all, on the cause of action pleaded by him, and where there is material variance between his pleadings and proof, it is fatal to a recovery.[89] Where there is no question but that plaintiff's injury resulted from a fall caused by defendant's negligence, plaintiff is not obliged to establish with certainty the exact manner in which his injury was inflicted.[90]

c. Evidence

General rules govern as to presumptions and burden of proof, and as to the admissibility and the weight and sufficiency of evidence in actions against sleeping car companies.

The burden of showing a failure or neglect on the part of the company or its employees to exercise the care owed to the passenger and his effects is on plaintiff,[91] as is also the burden of showing that the wrong alleged was the proximate cause of his injury.[92] Mere proof of a loss of baggage or property by a passenger while occupying a berth does not make out a prima facie case or give rise to a presumption of negligence on the part of the company, but to sustain a recovery some evidence of negligence on its part must be shown,[93] as in case of such loss a presumption has been held to exist in favor of the company that it performed its duty toward its passengers.[94] Where, however, plaintiff shows that defendant was guilty of negligence, as for failure to keep a reasonable watch, defendant has the burden of explanation and of showing the exercise of a proper degree of care.[95] On the oth-

Assault by employee
A declaration charging that plaintiff was passenger on defendant's car, when its agent, servant, and employee assaulted her and made indecent proposals, was demurrable, where it did not allege the scope of such servant's duties.—Schilling v. Pullman Co., D.C.Fla., 292 F. 768.

Assault by passenger
A passenger's petition against railroad and sleeping car company for damages sustained by reason of assault by intoxicated fellow passenger stated no cause of action, although alleging that fellow passenger's intoxicated condition was known to conductors, where petition did not otherwise show that conductors might have reasonably anticipated the assault.—Powell v. Evidence not admissible
Where plaintiffs purchased railway tickets at Baltimore to Newbern and paid for a berth in a Pullman from Washington to Goldsboro, and sued for failure to provide a berth at Washington, it was error, being beyond the allegations, to prove that the gateman would not let them through the gates of Baltimore in time to reach Washington before the departure of the Pullman in which their berth was reserved.—Sultan v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 96 S.E. 897, 176 N.C. 136

Retention of porter
Where no basis for punitive damages was laid in pleadings in action against carrier for assault by Pullman porter, question whether carrier ratified conduct of porter by retaining him was immaterial.—Pullman Co. v. v. Hall, C.C.A.W.Va., 46 F.2d 399.

10 C.J. p 1184 notes 44, 45.

Failure to exercise reasonable watch
Plaintiff boarded defendant's sleeping car at night, and the porter preceded him and placed his bag beside his berth, which was made up, and before retiring plaintiff went to the washroom and then returned to his former position. When he arose in the morning his bag was gone. While the mere proof of loss of property by a passenger while occupying a berth does not make out a prima facie case, a sleeping car company is a quasi bailee for hire and a quasi watchman, and under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur it is er hand, where plaintiff's baggage was intrusted to the care of defendant's employees, the passenger makes out a prima facie case by proving a demand for its return and the sleeping car company's refusal or inability to return it[96]

Since, ordinarily, as discussed in C.J.S. title Agency § 333 c (4), the principal is not liable for punitive or exemplary damages because of the wrongdoing of the agent unless he authorized or ratified it or participated therein, a passenger on a sleeping car, who was insulted and damaged by the acts of the porter, has the burden of proving, as a prerequisite to the recovery of punitive damages, that the company authorized or ratified the porter's acts.[97]

There is no presumption that a person under the influence of intoxicating liquors will commit an assault without provocation, nor will an inference be authorized from the mere fact of intoxication that a person in such condition might be reasonably expected so to conduct himself.[98]

The burden of proving the alleged contributory negligence of the passenger is generally on the company, unless it is established by the passenger's own evidence.[99]

The presence of a porter on the platform alongside defendant's sleeping cars, in full view of defendant's other employees, and the porter's wearing of the uniform, badge, and cap of defendant, have been held to raise a presumption that the porter was in defendant's employ.[1]

Where an accident happens, such as the falling of a berth, or the like, which is in its nature attributable to some defect in the car or appliances, it will make out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the company.[2] Where, however, plaintiff was injured by slipping on the sill of a sleeping car of the latest and most approved type of construction, in perfect repair, the film of ice, if any, on the sill, which caused the fall, being so imperceptible that it could not be observed without getting down on the floor and scraping the sill with a knife, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply.[3] Likewise, the doctrine does not apply in an action for injuries to a passenger caused by the sudden closing of a door in a sleeping car.[4]

Admissibility. General rules of evidence apply in an action by a passenger against a sleeping car company with respect to the admissibility of evidence,[5] irrespective of whether action is for failure to furnish accommodations reserved,[6] for injuries sustained by reason of company's negligence,[7] not the injury, but the manner and circumstances of the injury that justify the inference of negligence, and plaintiff established a prima facie case of the sleeping car company's negligence in failing to exercise a reasonable watchfulness over the bag to prevent its loss during the night, shifting the burden of explanation to defendant, although plaintiff's burden to show negligence still remained.—Goldstein v. Pullman Co, 116 N.E. 376 220 N.Y 549, L.R.A 1918B 1060, affirming 147 N. Y S 133, 161 App Div. 756.

6. Evidence held admissible

(1) In an action to recover for a failure of the company to reserve a berth, evidence of the rudeness of the conductor in ejecting the passenger from the car is admissible—Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Booth, Tex Civ.App., 28 S W. 719.

(2) Also evidence of the inconvenience, annoyances, pain, and suffering incident to traveling in ordinary coaches is admissible—Aplington v. Pullman Co., 97 N.Y.S. 329, 110 App. Div. 250, 17 N.Y.Ann Cas. 455—10 C. J. p 1185 note 51.

(3) Likewise, evidence of the happenings at the place where the accommodations were to be furnished is admissible—Bonner v. Pullman Co, 159 S.E. 382, 160 S C. 531, 76 A. L R. 922—10 C.J. p 1185 note 52.

(4) As bearing on the question of the authority of the persons through whom sleeping car or palace car reservations were made, evidence that facts showing special injuries for failure to furnish accommodations were communicated to such persons is admissible—Pullman Co v. Meyer, Ala, 70 So. 763.

(5) To establish the authority of an agent to make such reservations, similar acts on his part and the recognition of them by the company under similar circumstances may be shown.

Ohio—Pullman Co. v. Willett, 27 Ohio Cir Ct 649.

Tex.—Pullman Palace Car Co v. Nelson, 54 S.W. 624, 22 Tex Civ. App 223.

7. Evidence held admissible

The agreement between the sleeping car company and the railroad, and the rules of both are admissible to show a breach of duty on the part of the sleeping car company's employees, which resulted in plaintiff's injuries.—Pullman Co v. Waln, C C. A Pa., 4 F.2d 1, 41 A L.R. 1393, certiorari denied 46 S.Ct. 19, 269 U.S. 557, 70 L.Ed. 410

Evidence held inadmissible

In an action for injuries sustained through the alleged negligence of a porter, evidence that the porter was usually careful, competent, and attentive is inadmissible, such evidence is not rendered admissible by the testimony of a witness for plaintiff that she had on one occasion noticed him doing his work in a manner tending to show that it put him in an unpleasant frame of mind—Harriman v Pullman Palace-Car Co, Mo., 85 F. 353, 29 C C.A. 191.

or for loss of property [8]

Weight and sufficiency. The weight and sufficiency of the evidence is governed by general rules [9] Plaintiff is not bound to prove his case beyond a reasonable doubt, a preponderance of the evidence being sufficient,[10] nor need he produce more evidence than is sufficient for the purpose of his case [11] Mere failure of plaintiff to avail himself of an opportunity to corroborate his own testimony by that of witnesses tendered by defendant cannot operate to his prejudice.[12]

d. Trial

The trial of an action against a sleeping car company is governed by general rules

Questions of law and of fact, in an action against a palace or sleeping car company by a passenger, are governed by the rules obtaining in civil actions generally. Thus, the reasonableness of a rule promulgated by the company concerning its passengers is generally regarded as a question for the court.[13] So, where the evidence is clear and undisputed in favor of plaintiff[14] or defendant,[15] the court may dispose of the case by directing a verdict; but where there is sufficient evidence to be submitted to the jury, and it is conflicting or doubtful, the issues should be submitted to the jury, with proper in-

Duties of porter

In action against sleeping car company for injury from being transported in an insufficiently heated car, testimony of defendant's assistant superintendent as to the duty of defendant's porter to build a fire in the sleeper was properly admitted—Pullman Co v McGowan, Tex Civ App, 210 S.W 842, error refused

In action against carrier for assault by Pullman porter, rejection of testimony of another porter that immediately after assault passenger made no charge that porter had touched her was error. Also, testimony that passenger had drunk whisky shortly before retiring and had whisky in her possession was admissible, where defense was that Pullman porter put hand in her berth solely in attempt to find whisky, and such fact was a circumstance for jury's consideration in determining damage to her from shock when Pullman porter put his hand in her berth—Pullman Co. v. Hall, C.C.A W Va., 46 F 2d 399.

8. Other robberies

(1) In an action for the loss of property, evidence of other robberies in the same car on the same night is competent as bearing on the absence of proper care by the company—Pullman Co. v Schober, Tex.Civ App., 149 S.W 236—10 C.J. p 1185 note 56.

(2) Such evidence, however, cannot be used to show that the passenger was in fact robbed.—Pullman Car Co. v. Gardner, 3 Pennyp.,Pa., 78

Declarations

(1) Declarations of other passengers that they had been robbed are hearsay evidence and inadmissible—Bevis v. Baltimore, etc., R Co, 26 Mo.App 19.

(2) Likewise, declarations of an employee as to his suspicions are not admissible—Bevis v Baltimore, etc., R. Co, supra.

(3) Declarations of an employee made at the time and constituting a part of the res gestæ are, however, admissible.—Strauss v. Pullman Palace Car Co, 7 La.App., Orleans, 67
10 C.J p 1185 note 60

Declarations, explanations, and suggestions of an employee of a sleeping car company whose duty it is to care for the passenger's baggage, made on the passenger's inquiry while on the car as to what had become of his baggage taken away by such employee, is admissible in an action for its loss—Hampton v Pullman Palace Car Co, 42 Mo App 134.

Unfounded fears

In an action against a sleeping car company for loss of passenger's clothes, testimony of plaintiff as to mental anxiety or fear which was in fact unfounded was inadmissible—Pullman Co v. Moise, Tex.Civ App, 187 S W 249.

(1) To sustain a finding that sleeping woman was assaulted, and that she did not dream that she was assaulted.—Pullman Co. v. Pulliam, 218 S.W 1005, 187 Ky 213.

(2) To warrant finding of defendant's negligence—Caldwell v. Pullman Co, 128 S E 504, 132 S.C. 321.

(3) To authorize a reasonable deduction or conclusion by the jury that defendant's porter was guilty of the theft of plaintiff's diamond stud.—Pullman Co. v. Bullock, Tex. Civ App, 231 S.W 1112
10 C J p 1185 note 61 [a].

Evidence held insufficient

(1) To show that defendant by act or omission had violated any duty incumbent on it which caused the injury.—Griffith v. Pullman Co., 121 A. 362, 142 Md. 514.

(2) To show contributory negligence.—International-Great Northern R. Co v Purswell, Tex.Civ.App, 16 S W 2d 363

(3) To raise an issue of theft by porter—Pullman Co. v. Franks, Tex Civ.App, 187 S W. 501

(4) To show negligence of defendant company in failing to find rings left in ladies' dressing room, either before or after it knew of the loss—Pullman Co v. Hays, Tex Civ App, 257 S W 686, certified questions answered Com App, 271 S W 1108, 114 Tex 490.
10 C J p 1185 note 61 [b]

Luggage intrusted to station porter

In an action by a traveler, who had his hand bag carried into a Pullman car by a station porter or red cap and then was unable to find it, evidence did not warrant a finding that it was left in custody of Pullman employees, so as to make the carrier liable as an insurer—Sneddon v. Payne, 187 N Y S 185, 114 Misc 537

Porter's testimony that step box over which passenger tripped was not in passageway did not conclusively prove absence of negligence—Watson v. Pullman Co., 38 S W.2d 430, 238 Ky. 491.

That side doors and trapdoors were left open, and resulted in injuries to Pullman car passengers, were facts from which jury could infer lack of care on part of Pullman company in performing part of common joint duty to traveler in which it had united with railroad.—Pullman Co. v. Waln, C C A.Pa, 4 F 2d 1, 41 A.L.R. 1393, certiorari denied 46 S Ct 19, 269 U S. 557, 70 L Ed. 410 structions.[16] The question whether or not the company exercised a reasonable and proper degree of care under the circumstances is for the determination of the jury, where the evidence is disputed, or is such that different conclusions might reasonably be drawn therefrom,[17] or is a question of fact for the court when sitting without a jury.[18] The question of the passenger's contributory negligence,[19] or whether his conduct was unreasonable so as to go in mitigation of damages,[20] is also generally one of fact under the evidence.

Leaving diamond under pillow
A passenger going from his berth to the washroom and leaving his diamond under his pillow was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Pullman Co. v. Bullock, Tex.Civ.App., 231 S.W. 1112.

Looking at light
Passenger injured in tripping over stepladder in aisle, was not contributorily negligent as matter of law because of knowing stepladder was being used and of looking at light in turning toward rear of car.—Barrett v. Pullman Co., 153 A. 837, 85 N.H. 33.

Jewelry in bag
(1) Whether a passenger in a sleeping car, who left overnight a five hundred dollar diamond pin in his traveling bag on the floor between berths, took such care of this pin as was commensurate with the occasion, was for the jury.—Hood v. Pullman Co., 198 N.Y.S. 231, 130 Misc. 242.
(2) Whether alighting passenger who permitted suitcase containing valuable jewelry to be taken by defendant Pullman company's porter with fifty or sixty other bags, without apprising him of facts, and remained in car until thirty other passengers had debarked and departed with their luggage was contributorily negligent so as to preclude recovery for loss of suitcase and its contents was for jury.—Reisinger v. Contributory negligence
An instruction that plaintiff cannot recover if he was guilty of contributory negligence, without hypothesizing that the loss of the property sued for was caused by such contributory negligence, is erroneous.—Pullman Palace-Car Co. v. Adams, 24 So. 921, 120 Ala. 581, 74 Am.S.R. 53, 45 L.R.A. 767.

Instructions held free from error
N.C.—Brinkley v. Pullman Co., 142 S.E. 30, 195 N.C. 859.

Instructions held proper
An amended instruction for defendant in a suit for injuries received by plaintiff when boarding a Pullman car, requiring the jury, in order to find for plaintiff, to find the railroad company guilty of negligence in failing to place a foot stool in a safe position or on an even surface of the platform, and further to find plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to catch the handrail of the car, or give her child, which she was carrying, to an employee, was correct, and covered defendant's theory of the case.—Link v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., Mo.App., 233 S.W. 834.

Instructions held error
(1) In action for assault by porter on Pullman car passenger, instruction as to carrier's retention of Pullman conductor, who may have countenanced violation of liquor laws, must conform to the pleadings and the evidence,[22] must not be misleading,[23] abstract,[24] or argumentative,[25] and must not ignore, or omit to charge on, material facts in issue,[26] express opinions on controverted facts,[27] nor withdraw or exclude an issue of fact from the jury.[28]

Verdict and findings. General rules governing verdicts and findings apply, and the verdict must not be based on mere conjecture or suspicion.[29] Where the findings of the jury are utterly inconsistent with each other a judgment cannot be rendered thereon,[30] and where special findings and the general verdict are not conflicting, the general verdict controls, and judgment should be entered thereon.[31]

§ 920. Damages

In an action against a sleeping car company for its breach of duty or negligence, the plaintiff, if entitled to recover, should be awarded such damages as, in the discretion of the jury, the evidence shows that he suffered as a result of the defendant's wrong. Damages for mental distress alone are not usually recoverable, nor are punitive damages unless the defendant has been guilty of recklessness or maliciousness.

In accordance with the usual rules of damages, in an action against a sleeping car company for failure to furnish accommodations or for loss or injury to a passenger or his effects, the amount of damages to be awarded rests largely in the discretion of the jury,[32] subject to the qualification that the damages allowed must not exceed that which the evidence shows that plaintiff suffered as a direct result of defendant's wrong or negligence.[33]

was prejudicial error—Pullman Co. v. Hall, C.C.A.W.Va., 46 F.2d 399

(2) As a sleeping car company was one of defendants, it was error to charge that it was a common carrier, and owed passenger duty of exercising extraordinary care and diligence for her safety.—Pullman Co. v. Strang, 132 S.E. 399 35 Ga.App 59

Liability of joint tort-feasor

In passenger's action for injuries against sleeping car and railroad companies, the sleeping car company could not complain that the liability of the railway company was not submitted to the jury, so far as the judgment rendered against it in favor of the passenger was concerned, both it and the railway company being joint tort-feasors.—Pullman Co. v. Elements of damage

Where the petition alleged and the evidence showed that a passenger was compelled to vacate a warm bed in a drawing room and take a cold berth in the sleeper, it was immaterial how the berth became cold, and, in the absence of contributory negligence with respect to an open window, the carrier was not entitled to have the damages sustained by reason of the open window excluded, although the petition did not allege negligence respecting the open window.—Pullman Co. v. Cox, Tex.Civ.App., 220 S.W. 599, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

(1) $1,800 for broken toe and prolonged suffering, sustained from stumbling over a suitcase in aisle.—Caldwell v. Pullman Co., 128 S.E. 504, 132 S.C. 321.

(2) $2,000, where a passenger compelled to vacate a drawing room and take a cold berth in the sleeper contracted a severe cold, which continued for several weeks affecting her face and throat and producing neuralgia, inflammation, and soreness of the throat, and the neuralgia finally affected her teeth, and required the removal of two teeth, and as a result of her sickness she was unable to pursue her occupation of music teacher, at which she was earning $25 a day, for several weeks.—Pullman Co. v. Cox, Tex.Civ.App., 220 S.W. 599, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

(3) $2,500, for carrier's failure to deliver Pullman accommodations from Buffalo, N. Y., to Stevenson, Wash., to lady seventy-six years old.—Pierce v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 271 P. 976, 127 Or. 461, 62 A.L.R. 644.

(4) $2,995, where plaintiff's left ankle was turned and she was bruised about her hips, legs, and spine—Lenk v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., Mo.App., 233 S.W. 834.

(5) $1,000 verdict, for added suffering, inconvenience, and discomfort from riding on the day coach, where a sick passenger was refused Pullman accommodation, and his suffering augmented by his failure to secure a comfortable bed during a fifteen-hour journey.—Pullman Co. v. 10 C.J. p 1182 note 20 [b].

Recovery held excessive

(1) $250, for refusal of Pullman berth accommodation conforming to a passenger's ticket for a fifteen-hour journey, should be reduced to $25.—Pullman Co. v. Walton, 239 S.W. 385, 152 Ark. 633.

(2) $1,500, for failure to furnish passenger accommodations in a sleeping car other than that to which negroes were admitted.—Alabama, etc., R. Co. v. Morris, 60 So. 11, 103 Miss. 511, Ann.Cas.1915B 613

(3) $2,000, where woman who was ill was prostrated by excitement caused by defendant's conductor ordering her to leave the car in which her physician and nurse had berths, ordered reduced to $300.—Pullman

For the wrong of the sleeping car company through its employees in denying or failing to provide accommodations to a passenger, to which he is entitled, or in failing reasonably to provide for his safety and comfort, the damages recoverable are for the inconvenience, annoyances, pain, and suffering which result to him as a natural and probable result of the breach of duty, and which might or should have been foreseen or reasonably anticipated as a result thereof,[34] subject to the limitation that the damages recoverable cannot be enhanced by the negligence or willful conduct of the passenger;[35] and the damage may be mitigated by any unreasonable conduct on the part of the passenger.[36] If no other damages are sustained from a refusal of accommodations, at least the sum paid therefor, with interest, may be recovered.[37] Where the company is guilty of a tort as well as a breach of contract, the damages awarded must be commensurate with the injury, whether or not they were in contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made.[38] There can, of course, be no recovery for damages which are not asked for in the pleadings,[39] or which are not the natural and probable result of the breach of duty and which could not reasonably have been anticipated as a probable consequence of the wrong.[40]

Loss of property. In accordance with the rules already discussed in § 915, a passenger, whose baggage has been lost through the negligence of the sleeping car company, is entitled to damages for the bag, or bags, and such of its contents as were reasonably appropriate to the journey and plaintiff's destination, bearing in mind his station in life, the duration of the journey, and its purposes.[41] Where the property in question has a market

(4) $5,000, for carrying passenger beyond destination.—Pullman Co. v. Strang, 132 S.E. 399, 35 Ga.App. 59.

(6) $15,000, for an assault on a woman passenger while sleeping in a berth, was excessive and a remittitur to $10,000 required, in view of the fact that plaintiff apparently was not seriously injured and that defendant had a rule requiring a guard in the aisle, which was disregarded by the employees.—Culbreth v. Damages held not excessive

Where a passenger compelled to vacate a drawing room and take a cold berth in the sleeper contracted a severe cold, which continued for several weeks affecting her face and throat and producing neuralgia, inflammation, and soreness of the throat, and the neuralgia finally affected her teeth and required the removal of two teeth, and as a result of her sickness she was unable to pursue her occupation of music teacher, at which she was earning $25 a day, for several weeks, a verdict of $2 000 was not excessive.—Pullman Co. v. Cox, Tex.Civ.App., 220 S.W. 599, dismissed, for want of jurisdiction.

Nominal damages

(1) It is duty of a sleeping car company to notify its passenger of his arrival at destination, notwithstanding it is not a common carrier, and breach thereof is negligence, and passenger is entitled to nominal damages.—Pullman Co. v. Strang, 132 S.E. 399, 35 Ga.App. 59—10 C.J. p 1182 note 15 [d].

(2) Proof of technical trespass by insertion of pullman porter's hand into female passenger's berth would entitle plaintiff to recover only nominal damages, unless proof established additional damage.—Pullman Co. v. Hall, C.C.A.W.Va., 55 F.2d 139.

(3) The maxim "de minimis non curat lex" does not bar recovery where only nominal damages have been suffered, if a substantial right has been violated.—Pullman Co. v. Dudley, Tex.Civ.App., 77 S.W.2d 592.

Proximate result

Where a passenger was compelled to vacate a drawing room and take a cold berth in a sleeper, where she contracted a severe cold, causing neuralgia which affected her teeth and required the removal of two of them, and as a result of such sickness she was unable to pursue her occupation of music teacher, the damages on account of the injury to and loss of teeth and the loss of earnings were the proximate result of the negligence of the carrier.—Pullman Co. v. Cox, Tex.Civ.App., 220 S.W. 599, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Under Mexican law

A sleeping car passenger, who had a lower berth reserved for return trip from Mexico and was required to occupy upper berth, was not entitled to recover damages from sleeping car company for illness suffered while traveling in Mexico and allegedly emphasized because of having to ride in upper berth, where Mexican statutes, as interpreted by expert, permit recovery of damages only for loss of tangible things having pecuniary value.—Rauton v. Not limited by statute

In an action to recover damages for loss or injury to personal prop-

value, that is the proper standard of value, but if it is not shown to be marketable, the value of the property to its owner furnishes the proper rule of recovery, that is, the actual loss in money which he sustains by being deprived of the articles.[42] Where the property stolen consisted of medicine and stimulants for a sick passenger, by reason of the loss of which she suffered unrelieved pain and distress incident to her condition, she is entitled to recover damages, not only for the value of the medicine and stimulants, etc., but also for physical suffering and mental distress caused by their loss.[43]

Mental distress. Although it has been held that a sleeping car company's breach of duty to a passenger which causes an infliction of injury to the feelings, mental suffering, or humiliation, even in the absence of physical injury, affords an adequate foundation for the award of actual or compensatory damages,[44] it has generally been held that mental distress is not a proper element of damages,[45] unless the breach of contract is accompanied by physical inconvenience or suffering,[46] or unless the case is one in which punitive damages would be allowed.[47]

Punitive damages. Where the company's employees have been guilty of recklessness, willfulness, or maliciousness in causing the passenger's injuries, punitive damages may be allowed, but not where such elements do not exist.[48] It has been held, however, that to justify the recovery of punitive damages, there must be either authorization or ratification of the employee's wrongful act.[49] Ratification, under such circumstances, involves the adoption of the act of the servant with knowledge of the facts;[50] and mere retention of the employee in the employment of the company does not necessarily amount to ratification.[51]

IV. FEDERAL EMERGENCY RAILROAD ACT

§ 921. Purpose and Effect of Act

This Act was designed to relieve the emergency existing at the time of its enactment in relation to interstate transportation. The provision prohibiting the elimination of existing routes with the consent of participating lines or order of the coördinator included such eliminations by the carriers, although there is authority also to the contrary.

The Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 250 et seq, was intended to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate transportation; and generally speaking, it was enacted to save certain railroads from bankruptcy and to perpetuate an efficient means of interstate transportation in the United States.[52]

Unfounded fears

A passenger, however, is not entitled to recover for her mental anxiety or fear of some contingency, when the anxiety was unfounded and the contingency never came to pass—Pullman Co v Moise, Tex.Civ.App., 187 S.W. 249—Pullman Palace Car Co v. McDonald, 21 S.W. 945, 2 Tex Civ.App. 322.

52. U.S.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. U.S., D.C.Ill., 10 F.Supp. 185, 192 "In short, the act was to administer oxygen to critical patients and to relieve those who were suffering from sinking spells. Its tone forbids the conclusion that the strong carriers might exterminate the weaker competitor. Rather was it the announced policy of the Government to render assistance to all carriers and keep their heads above water until calmer times appeared."—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. U.S., supra.

The provision of the Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 254 (1), that no routes now existing shall be eliminated except with the consent of all participating lines or on order of the coordinator, has been held to include the carriers in its prohibition against eliminating existing routes unless by the necessary consent or order; and, under this view, the provision applies although notice had been filed by the carrier of the intended elimination of the route, where the Act became law before the expiration of the thirty days' notice required by the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 6 (3).[53] It has been held, however, that the provision was intended to relate to the subject matter of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, and did not effect a curtailment of the powers and duties conferred upon the interstate commerce commission by the Interstate Commerce Act as amended, 49 U.S.C.A. §§ 6 (1, 3), 13 (1) and 15 (7); and, under this view, the filing and publishing of a new rate in accordance with the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 6, is proper even though such rate eliminates a joint rate without the consent of all the participating carriers.[54]

§ 922. Duties, Authority, and Power of Coordinator

The duties, authority, and powers of the coördinator are to be determined from the Act read as a whole.

In determining the duties, authority, and powers of the coördinator, the Act must be read as a whole and not merely looked at by sections.[55] The authority of the coördinator is not limited to those matters wherein his judgment coincides with that of regional coordinating committees of the railroads.[56] The mere fact that the coordinator failed to give plaintiff a hearing does not render an order by him void, as the hearing and determination of an administrative question by an administrative officer are not governed by the rules applicable to the trial of cases in a court of law or equity.[57]

§ 923. Jurisdiction of Courts; Review of Orders

The courts have no jurisdiction in the first instance to determine administrative matters. A person dissatisfied with an order of the coördinator must first apply for a review thereof by the interstate commerce commission.

A suit to enjoin a revocation of a through interstate route and joint rate, without the consent of all participating lines or an order of the coordinator, presenting a question whether under the proper construction of the statute a route already duly established had been lawfully abolished, involves only matters of law appropriate to a court.[58] A railroad which objected to joint rates filed by another carrier with the interstate commerce commission, on the ground that the rates amounted to

Not an amendment

Elimination of existing route

Federal coördinator of transportation had authority under Emergency Railroad Transportation Act to prohibit establishment of proposed interchange of through passenger train equipment at Evansville, Ind., between the New York Central and the Chicago & Eastern Illinois railroads, where coördinator found that by substitution of such interchange existing routes would be eliminated without consent of participating lines and would unduly impair net earnings of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois railroad.—Louisville & N. Nonaction of committee

The Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 256 (a), provides "If, in any instance, a committee has not acted with respect to any matter which the coördinator has brought to its attention and upon which he is of the opinion that it should have acted, under the provisions of section 5, 49 U.S.C.A. § 255, he is hereby authorized and directed to issue and enforce such order." Where the coördinator sent a proposal to the committee asking them to investigate and report to him as soon as possible what action, if any, they were prepared to take on the proposal that through passenger traffic be routed over one railroad to the elimination of another, and where the committee failed to report on the effect of the proposal on the railroad deprived of such traffic, the committee failed to act thereon thereby justifying an order by the coördinator.—Louisville & N. Injunction

(1) Injunction against revocation of through interstate route and joint rate by railway company without all participating lines' consent or railroad coördinator's order was the proper remedy of railway company adversely affected thereby, under Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 254 (1).—Quanah, A. & P. Ry. Co. v. Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co., C.C.A.Tex., 67 F.2d 826.

(2) Railway company's suit to enjoin revocation of joint through interstate route, without all participating lines' consent or railroad coordinator's order, was not moot after date fixed by notice of change, which was prohibited by statute effective before such date.—Quanah, A. & P. the closing of an existing joint route without the consent of all the participating lines, has been held to be required to exhaust its administrative remedy before the interstate commerce commission by procuring before it a determination of the reasonableness and legality of the rates under the new tariff before resorting to the courts.[59]

Under the provisions of the Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 259, that any interested party dissatisfied with any order of the coördinator may, at any time prior to the effective date of the order, file a petition with the interstate commerce commission asking that such order be reviewed and suspended during such review, a person dissatisfied with an order of the coordinator must apply for a review thereof by the commission before seeking relief in the courts, notwithstanding the fact that the commission may deny his application and refuse to hear him on the merits of his petition.[60]

CARROM or CARROMS. In a popular sense, the word is used to describe the hitting and glancing away of one object from another; hence, in both the singular and the plural, a descriptive name in billiards where one ball strikes another, and then, glancing, strikes a third, and defined to be the hitting of two or three balls in succession by the cue ball from one stroke of the cue;[1] also a game played with disks where the object is not necessarily to strike two separate disks or balls, but to drive a disk into a pocket.[2]

Phrases: "Carrom Board," "carrom game," "Disco, The Great Carrom Game," "Five-Pin Cuban Carrom Game,"[3] and "The Game of Carroms"[4]

CARROTED FUR. In felt hat manufacturing, fur that has been treated by a solution of nitrate of mercury, so as to remove the water-repellent substance covering the fibers of the fur, causing the scales upon their surface to protrude to a greater extent than they do upon those of raw or uncarroted fur, and the body of the fiber itself to absorb moisture, making it more pliable and in this condition more easily to interlock with other fibers of fur, or of wool, distinguished from "raw fur" which has not been so treated.[5]

CARRUCA. In the civil law, a sort of four-wheeled traveling carriage.[6]

CARRY.

Present Tense

Used in its active transitive sense, the word has been said to connote transportation,[7] and has been defined as meaning to bear;[8] to bear or cause to be borne as from one place to another;[9] to convey, or transport.[10]

Used commercially the word has several connotations, derived from its primary meanings; and it has been defined as meaning to bear the charges or burden of holding or having, as stocks, merchandise, etc., from one time to another, to hold, to keep on one's books as a debtor, also to keep on hand, keep up, or maintain,[11] to possess, to support,[12] and also in a particular context, to advance.[13] "Carry" has been described as analogous to "ship;"[14] has been held equivalent to, or syn-

60. U.S.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. U.S., D.C.Ill., 10 F.Supp. 185, 191.
"In disposing of this contention we might observe that plaintiffs' right to apply to the Commission is clear. It is absolute and unqualified. No action of the Commission is necessary to permit them to make application for review of the coördinator's order. The coördinator may not prevent them from making application. The Commission, it is true, may, upon the presentation of the application, dismiss it, but in doing so the Commission must act. It must exercise its discretion. It is the action of the Commission that is essential. Whether the action be affirmative or negative is immaterial. The absolute right of plaintiffs to apply to the Commission and the latter's obligation to take action on the application make it necessary for the plaintiffs to apply first to the Commission before it applies to a court of equity for injunctive relief."—Louisville & N. "The word 'ship' . . . express-

onymous with, "bear," see Bear 10 C.J.S. p 219 note 45, "convey," "transport,"[15] and "wear;"[16] and has been contrasted with, or distinguished from, "draw," "move," "pull," "push," "shove,"[17] and "sustain."[18]

Carry on. The term, when applied to business, has been said to have a well settled signification, and has been defined as meaning to advance,[19] to conduct,[20] to continue,[21] to continue to prosecute, to help forward, to keep in progress, to manage or be engaged in, to promote, or to prosecute,[22] and to transact.[23]

Carry out. To execute.[24]

Carry stock. To loan part of the purchase price of the stock, charging interest and crediting dividends and holding the stock as security for the loan;[25] to provide funds or credit for its payment for the period agreed upon from the date of purchase.[26] It has been said that the term might include a transaction where the whole purchase price is loaned, but this is not the usual arrangement.[27]

Other phrases: "Agreed to 'carry' the interest of another party" and "carry a full stock,"[28] "carry costs,"[29] "carry life insurance,"[30] "carry on business" and cognate phrases see Business 12 C.J.S. p 789 note 42–p 791 note 88, "carry on trade,"[31] "'carry' weight,"[32] "purchase or carry obligations or securities,"[33] and "used to carry passengers for a consideration."[34]

Carried

The past tense and past participle of "carry," which has been held equivalent to, or synonymous with, "transported,"[35] and contrasted with, or distinguished from, "forwarding"[36] and "worn."[37]

Phrases: "Carried on as a business for pecuniary gain" see Business 12 C.J.S. p 789 note 42, "carried on business," see Business 12 C.J.S. p 789 note 43, "insurance now carried or to be hereafter carried by him,"[38] "no measure can be declared 'carried,'"[39] and "usually 'carried' by tourists and travellers."[40]

Carrying

The present participle of the verb "carry," which primarily conveys the idea of transportation,[41] and has been specifically defined as the act or business of transporting from one place to another.[42]

Unless expressly stipulated, a special rate contract is not binding on other carriers,[58.1] and where no privity of contract exists between a freight forwarder and a trucker carrying the goods the special rates do not apply.[58.2] Where shipments do not conform with the requirements of the tariff as to wharfage and handling charges, such charges are not recoverable.[58.3] Other matters relating to United States government shipments have been adjudicated.[58.4]

Under the Freight Forwarder Act, carriers may establish assembling and distribution rates, applicable to freight forwarders and others who employ carriers under like conditions, which differ from rates applying to others using the same facilities or services.[25.5]

Dissimilar operating conditions between two routes do not, per se, justify discrimination,[24.10] there must be something in the dissimilarity of operating conditions which would make it unjust to require a carrier to extend to a connecting carrier the same joint through rate arrangement which it maintains with another connecting carrier.[24.15]

Interlining; interchanging Interlining is the practice whereby a carrier, whose certified routes do not reach the shipment destination, transfers the shipment to another carrier for delivery.[72.5] One form involves a trip-lease, that is, the shipment trailer is taken by the transferee but no trailer is given in exchange, the trailer taken being leased by the transferor for completion of the trip.[72.10] An interchange involves a truckload quantity, so that the exchange of trailers eliminates the necessity of unloading and reloading.[72.15] Interchanging, thus, is a form of interlining whereby trailers are switched at the point of transfer.[72.20]

One carrier may not maintain an action for damages by way of restitution against another who is operating along the same route pursuant to a certificate and order that is subsequently voided by the state supreme court. [34.5]

34.5 Ill—Illini Coach Co v Illinois Highway Transp Co 166 N E 2d 161 25 Ill App 2d 168

If there are carriers already in the field, a utilities commission must determine, as part of its findings as to whether a new service is convenient and necessary, whether the service should be rendered by an existing carrier or by a new applicant. [34.10] A utilities commission need not approve or reject a carrier's application as submitted, but it may attach to the certificate such reasonable terms, conditions, and limitations as the public convenience and necessity may require. Negligence of a third person does not affect the obligation to use due care,[95 25] and observance of such negligence may require increased care.[95 30] The doctrine of nonliability in the case of sudden emergency requires that the carrier be free from negligence in creating the emergency,[95 35] and that proper action be taken in the emergency.[95 40] In the face of imminent peril the employee in charge must bring the vehicle under such control that it can be stopped absolutely to avoid the threatened danger.[95 45]
